Jensen Outlines Responsibilities For School Board Member

Summing up his stand on his candidacy for a position to succeed himself as a member of the board of education, Guy W. Jensen today issued the following statement:

"A member of the board of education has three-fold duties to perform: First, his duty to the taxpayers. Second, his duty to the school children. Third, his duty to the teachers.

"The modern school system is a vast business enterprise demanding efficient business administration. With assets amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars, every precaution must be made to see that these assets are protected—and that expenditures are made wisely. Perhaps no where in our social fabric has there been such changes as have been seen in our school systems. A school system must be progressive and at the same time must be sane. Taxpayers give unstintingly and uncomplicity—hence those funds should be conscientiously administered. So the member of a board of education shoulders grave responsibilities.

"He owes to the children of his community every possible chance for an education within the scope and means at his command. He has to be modern and practical at the same time.

"He is the employer of teachers and as such owes to them the same consideration as is usually granted by employer to employe. His teaching organization must be efficient; otherwise standards fall and difficulties arise.

"So the position calls for a trained business man—thorough and conscientious.

"I have endeavored to fill these qualifications in my term of office and shall continue to do so if re-elected."

HOW LONG, ROOKIEES? Where Will Promising Recruits Be Ten Years From Now?

By NORMAN E. BROWN
Central Press Sports Writer
Cleveland, O.—The big league rookies who bloomed in the spring training camps are now getting the acid test of the championship season.

Just how many of these youngsters, who seemingly have a bright future ahead of them, will be in the big show 10 years from now?

That's a hard question to answer. Perhaps the best answer lies in a review of the list of youngsters who, just 10 years ago, were picked to draw the winsome smiles of Dame Fortune.

Ran onto a list, the other day, the young lads considered as the 12 best looking prospects of the 1919 campaign in the majors. These 12 were: Horace Ford, of the new comers who had survived their first year in the big show and were therefore due for another chance in 1920.

And here are the names of the

A. W. Keenan, village assessor: "It will make matters much easier if persons who have complaints on their writ large assessments will put the complaints in writing for the board of review. The blanks may be obtained at my office."

And as against the eventual showing of those 12 players—selected as the cream of the crop, the names of some of the others, who just drew passing mention, might be brought forward.

Tom Zachary, who grew up one of the best southpaws in the game, didn't look so hot to critics when he broke in in 1919. Vic Fcinich, catcher, also given a tryout with the Senators, is still catching in the big top—now with the Cincinnati Reds. Chuck Galloway and Jimmy Dykes got little attention in 1919 but they outstayed others by many years. Dykes is still with Connie. Galloway stopped down last year.

Others were Horace Ford, Rookie infielder with the Boston Braves, who drew honorable mention but wasn't picked to startle the majors. He's now rated as one of the greatest double play hitters in all—as one of the Red infielders.

Charley Grim started out with the Pirates that year. Not a bad ball player as the National League fans know him.

And Chic Fawcett, who carried on as a utility infielder with the Yankees for years and might have been a great ball player but for an accident, was given only second choice honors.

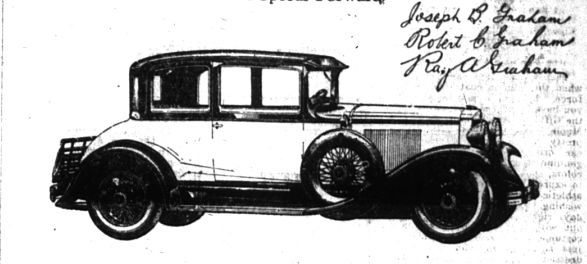

All of which would indicate that the road ahead for the rookies of 1929 is a rocky and uncertain one.
