Dinner Stories

The little girl was crying. Her mother, to distract her thoughts, asked, "Oh, come here, darling—come here and look at the airplane."

The little girl ran to the window and stared up at the airplane till it disappeared. Then she got out her little wet handkerchief again. "Mama, what was I crying about?" she asked.—Wall Street Journal.

Several West End shops, we are told, are no longer supplying patterns of cloth to their customers. They are rather tired of ladies who collect one or two and make a frock with them.—Humorist.

According to the papers, the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey is going to sell frankfurters and rolls at all their filling stations.

Which goes to show the lengths these places will go to in their efforts to be doggy.

It's hardly news but we recently heard of a fellow who wanted to go as a passenger on one of the endurance planes but had to give it up because he could only get two weeks' vacation.—Life.

talk is cheap, ask him if he knows how much a session of congress costs.—Life.

—"Now there's what I call a fine servant."

"Yes, he's been in our family for hours."—Life.

So far, the most practical use discovered for bridge prizes is to give them away for bridge prizes.—Life.
