College Life Not The Carefree Whirl

It's Pictured, U. Of M. Sociologist Says

Ann Arbor, Mich., Aug. 14.—College life often holds certain strains and disappointments for many undergraduates instead of being the carefree whirl popular in collegiate fiction, according to indications of a study of student life made by Robert C. Angell, Assistant Professor of sociology in the University of Michigan.

Undergraduates cannot be considered as a single type but must be regarded as individual cases in their adjustment to college life. Professor Angell made an intensive study of 213 students to determine how well they fitted into the social life of the University, how they stood academically and how seriously they had thought out a philosophy or plan of life for the present and the future.

Each student examined under these headings was in turn classified as being of mediocre or poor in social and academic adjustment, and good, emancipated, traditional or poor in his outlook on life as a whole. Those described as good felt that they had a sound, satisfactory opinion of life, those who were emancipated were dissatisfied with customary outlooks on life but had not yet found a philosophy to replace the old, traditional cases were those who accepted without criticism the views of the past, while the poor cases included persons whose plans and viewpoints toward life were very vague, uncertain or disturbed.

By using three social, three academic and four life adjustment classifications it was possible to make 36 types, and of this possible number 29 were actually encountered.

Case Histories Studied

Study of the group examined was carried out by means of personal histories of each student, by interviews with psychologists, and by tests on intelligence, information, and attitude social and economic questions.

The commonest type found was that which was well adjusted socially, fair or mediocre scholastically and unsettled or emancipated in life outlook. Social and academic adjustment seemed to have little in common with one another, but the best students tended to be among those poorly adjusted socially. In addition the good students seemed well oriented in life. Two sorts of good students were distinguished, those who were naturally brilliant in any activity, and those who were failures in social or life adjustment and threw all their energy into their studies to compensate for lack of ability in other ways.

The necessity of working one way through school, difficulty in getting along socially, and sex problems were the factors that loomed large in causing disturbing maladjustments of personality.

Work as Handicap

Many students felt that having to work at waiting table or washing dishes placed them in an unfavorable light with non-working students, and that they were handicapped socially, although there was no evidence that workers were in any sense looked down upon by more fortunate students.

Both men and women examined admitted that love affairs or lack of them often was a disturbing nature. Petting was regarded by most as quite natural and legitimate if carried on within limits. Those who objected strongly to the practice often fell in the group of those who held very strict traditional notions of conduct or were sometimes failures in a social way.

Religion as evidenced by the study seemed to be a decreasing influence in undergraduate life as compared with that of earlier generations. Only 37 per cent of the 216 questioned stated that religion was a deep interest in their lives, 10 per cent attended largely as a matter of form, 36 per cent admitted membership but took no interest whatsoever in their church, and 16 per cent had no connection at any time.

Tradition Drawback

A general aspect of the tests was that the least intelligent persons, especially among the men, were found in the group who expressed traditional viewpoints on social and economic problems, and in their philosophies of life. The student of best academic rank tended strongly to be modernistic in almost all other fields.

The most significant feature of the whole work, according to Professor Angell, is the wide amount of disorganization and uncertainty which occurs in the lives of the supposedly college students. While the majority of undergraduates are not seriously bothered or managed to adjust themselves, a large number have greater difficulty and fail to solve their problems in a way which does not injure their college records or leave them with warped attitudes to be carried into later life.

"Though college administrators and teachers are not so optimistic as the public in regard to student troubles, very few of them realize that so large a proportion—about 97 per cent—are in need of mental hygiene."

In recognition of this fact the University of Michigan will on a large scale its present facilities for mental hygiene in connection with the Health Service to assist students in avoiding mental conflicts detrimental to their college careers.
