education. I predict that, in the next century—and, while I'm about it, I may as well defy any of you to catch me up on this—I predict that in our next century the curricula of our public schools will show practically no resemblance to those in use today.

mass mind—a credential of beliefs to which everyone would be expected to subscribe. That is not what I am recommending at all. There are certain fundamental beliefs, however, which every citizen of the United States should subscribe to—which he must subscribe to if he is to fulfill his function as an American citizen. Every person who wears the mantle of American citizenship should believe in the inherent right of the majority to rule, to regulate, and to administer; he should respect the law of his land, in contradistinction to rendering it obedience; he must grant cheerfully to every fellow citizen, the right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness; he must know that the larger rights of citizenship can be his only when he surrenders some of his smaller rights; and he must know that he can know these things, and shape his conduct accordingly, without becoming mass-minded in the least.

be taught in our public schools. Some abler head than mine must tell us how this is to be done. I believe, however, I can be sufficiently specific to illustrate what I mean. Take the question of respect for law.
It is a rule of human conduct that with understanding comes appreciation. And certainly this must be true of the rules established to govern human conduct. I do not believe there is a man in this room, outside your legal members—not excluding the one who is addressing you—who knows the simplest facts about the laws of our land, yet do not know where we are within and without our simplest legal rights. If we did, we could work much better, at this business of being a citizen; and why don't we? Because no one has ever taught us. And why has no one ever taught us? I don't know. This is a thing which should be taught in our public schools. It ought to be possible to formulate some outline of basic laws which even a child can understand. It is done as to moral law in the Ten Commandments; surely it could be done as to civil conduct. This is something which should have the attention of our educational institutions. In cooperation of the American bar, then, this is done, we shall have respect for law.

the Shenandoah valley in mid-June. My hostess for the evening was a lady whose father for generations had claimed the Valley as his home. Bearing that I was from the North, but that I had a deep respect for the courage and traditions of the Southland, she told me some great tales of the sacrifices her people had made for their native Valley. She told me that her great-grandfather had died in the Civil War, or—as she called it—the War Between, the States. She told me that the property losses her family had sustained for you will remember that the General Sherman and the crow could not fly over the valley without taking along its own food. She told me the story of her grand father, of what a noble and wonderful character he was. She took me out in the kitchen where there sat doing a negro lady past 90 years old, born a slave on the plantation my hostess grand father. She told me how much this Valley meant to her and to her people. Finally, she told me their story for their Valley and its traditions had a strong influence over all their social activity. When boys are inclined to be naughty, there is held up before their eyes the panorama of the Valley's history. General Jackson would not have done so! General Lee would not sanction such actions! General Stuart would tolerate no such boys in his gallant cavalry regiments! Such characters would never have made the Valley famous for the heroism of its defenders!

Settlement Needed
My message is as simple as this—I believe that sentiment is the greatest thing in the life of a man, it is in the life of an individual. To serve a nation, one must love it, and to love it, one must know its traditions. Two years ago I journeyed down the Shenandoah valley of Virginia, that garden spot of America. You remember what happened in that beautiful valley in the years between 1861 and 1865. It was the gateway to Washington, and it was the granary of the arm of the Confederacy. The Southern Confederacy wished to preserve it for this two-fold purpose: as a threat against Washington, and as a source of food supply. The Army of the Potomac wished to destroy it because it did mean just these two things to the Confederacy. Consequently, it was the storm center of activity for a long time. As you drove through it, you saw the deep blue of the Blue Mountains on one side and the Alleghenies on the other, you see dreadful struggle that went on there. Marker after marker, and after tablet, tells of clashes between the boys in blue and the boys in gray. Jackson and Pope, Sheridan and Early, Stuart and Fitzpatrick—all of them shed their gallantry about the place.
As I drove along I felt a growing surge of pride that a nation of which I was a part could, at one and the same time, so fiercely attack and so staunchly defend a bit of its homeland. Finally night came on, as night came only in

MRS. James Cobb, of Oakland avenue, was a guest, Monday evening, at a Christmas dinner given by the Detroit Study Club, at the Women's City Club building. The dinner was followed by a program.

Mrs. P. K. Walker, and her son, Jerry, of Chicago, will spend the holidays with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph McDonough, 77 Martin avenue.

Mr. Roy Wragby, son of Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Wragby, of Ridgeland avenue, will return from Ann Arbor, Friday, to spend the holidays with his parents.

Miss Mary Ann Regal was hostess at a party Tuesday night in honor of Miss Mary Pyle who returned the same day, from Fairfax Hall to spend the holidays with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. L. N. Pyle of Euclid avenue.

J. R. Adams of Kenesaw avenue was host at a stag supper Friday night to 20 Detroit and Birmingham men, including W. A. P. John, Fletcher Richards, Joseph Hardig and Fred Woodruff from the village.

Saturday afternoon in Bloomfield Village the home of Mr. and Mrs. C. E. Rotsch will be open to children of the village who have been informally invited to a Christmas play followed by tea. Twelve girls take part in the presentation of "Christmas in Many Lands." Children of the village wanted to raise money for charity, so the affair was arranged by mothers.

Marius Fossenkemper returned Thursday from an 11-day tour with the Detroit Symphony Orchestra. Colleges visited were Cornell, Princeton, Dartmouth, Williams, Mt. Holyoke, and Smith. Mr. Fossenkemper is featured as a clarinetist with the Symphony.

At the home of Mrs. Ida Nixon on Hunt road Tuesday night, the F. N. G. Club elected officers at their Christmas party. The new president is Mrs. Emily Gilbert; vice-president, Miss Mattie Nixon; secretary, Mrs. Ida Dawson; treasurer, Mrs. Lillian MacQuar.

FIFTY children will have Christmas cheer through the generosity of men of the St. James Episcopal Men's Club. Each of the men was given one or more names for his shopping list, from the list of names on file at the Community House, Rev. Warner L. Forsyth made the general arrangements.

Young people of the Presbyterian church will have their Christmas party in the church Monday evening beginning at 5:30. Duward Harris is chairman of arrangements.

TONIGHT social workers of Oakland county meet at the Community House for a luncheon at 6:30 and to hear Judge Frank L. Covert's report on the recent child-welfare conference held in Washington, D. C. About 40 are expected to attend.
