To signs of Spring may now be added the first indications of revived real estate activities, as exemplified by George Wellington Smith's announcement of another home construction in Franklin Villa.

This attractive Early American home, adorning two acres in the rolling terrain of the new development, was designed by J.

Thursday afternoon at a sewing bee.

Robert Johns, seventh grader, was selected school champion and Gladys Bristol, eighth grade student, was selected second in line

Robert F. Swanson, Bloomfield Hills architect, and is scheduled for completion this summer.

Reflecting the best traditions of Early American architecture through the combined medium of stone, brick and white clapboard, this rambling structure includes four master bedrooms and four baths in the main building which is connected by a pergola to service quarters consisting of two bedrooms, a living room and kitchenette on the top floor, and a three-car garage and three stall stables on the ground level. The entrance is through a walled court-yard and completion for sale will include landscaping. In addition to the sleeping accommodations the main building also includes living, dining and kitchen accommodations as well as an attractive library and an exceptionally large recreation room. Four fireplaces, one each in the living room, library, recreation room and one in a master bedroom, are featured.

Taking its place among the other estates and homes now enhancing the Franklin district, its further assurance of the highly desirable character of the section developing to the southwest of Birmingham. The development is characterized by lovely hills, streams, woods and orchard lands and holds an outstanding position among North Woodward communities, justifying the faith in its future which led George Wellington Smith, its principal developer, to build homes appropriate for such a setting.

Service rendered not by gold but by the golden rule

No Wonder We're Called! The obvious superiority of our ambulance service wins for us the calls of those who are in a position to know what ambulance can serve best.

As perhaps our readers know, we have a fine ambulance, manned by trained and experienced attendants at all times. When an ambulance is needed, one should make sure he has the best.
