Mrs. Molla Propp

"I asked him,"

said MRS. MOLLA PROPP,

"to tighten the torque carefully."

MY DEAR, how could I possibly know that there would be a fire in that particular neighborhood and at the very moment when my car was parked in front of a fire plug?

I came just in time to see two policemen pushing the car to one side so that the firewagon could get near the plug.

Of course anyone knows that under very embarrassing circumstances one is to appear nonplussed, as they say, and smoke a cigarette. But I don't smoke, my dear. And besides, THERE was a policeman standing with one foot on the side walk of my car.

Well, I thought maybe he wasn't waiting for me... maybe he was just standing there resting and thinking about the weather. But he wasn't . . . I mean he WAS waiting for me. For when I tried to slide under the steering wheel as quietly as possible, he took out his book and asked my name.

"Oh, did I park in front of a fireplug?" I asked. "You did," he said. "Which one?" "That one back there." "Is THAT a fireplug?" "Yes ma'am. What did you think that it was—an aquarium?"

And so he gave the a ticket and Henry had to pay the fine for me, and was he mad? And the fire didn't amount to anything anyway, so I don't see why all that fuss was made about it. But next time I see a fire plug, my dear, I'm going to park three blocks away from it. They can keep their old fireplugs for all of me.
