

Mrs. Molla Propp

"I jumped a foot," said MRS. MOLLA PROPP, "when the transmission backfired."

THE radio is a wonderful invention, my dear, and I never really appreciated what a wonderful comfort it is to have one in the car until last evening. Henry and I went out for a lovely evening drive and it was rather late when we started back home. All at once, "Bang!" went a tire and Henry said, "well, you might know what HE would say under the circumstances. Of course, we both piled out and Henry looked into the tool box under the seats. Then he looked under the door covering. Next he lifted the lid in front of the engine and looked all around. Finally he went back and looked in the tool box again. "It may have been woman's intuition," but I rather suspected that Henry was looking for something he couldn't find, and I asked him what it was and he said it was the handle for the jack or jill, or some such person's name. "Do you mean that long, flat piece of iron?" I asked. "Yes," he said, "where the heck is it?" "Oh, I used it to poke the tire with," I admitted. Then Henry said wasn't fit for a lady to hear. And while Henry raved and looked around for the plank and things one lifts wheels with, I listened to the grandest music. Of course, deep down in his heart Henry knew it was all his fault for not getting a new boiler when we lost the other one. But when one is listening to the "Dorador Song from Bohemian Girl," one just hasn't the heart to rub it in, my dear.
