Continual expansion and increased popularity have marked the annual St. James Fair since its beginning more than 20 years ago. The League of St. James Women, says.

The first fair was held in the basement of the church, on half of the basement being devoted to the bazaar, while dinner was served in the remaining half for 10 cents. When the price was raised to 25 cents, according to old members of the League, the ladies feared some persons would be unwilling to pay what was considered a "best seller" at that price.

The idea of giving an Italian street fair was first conceived June six years ago. Maple avenue and Chester street were roped off and decorated with garlands. The workers were roped off in appropriate and beautiful costumes. Dinner was served at all-Italian style, and dancing in the lot behind the church.

Many older children in the village look back with pride on the first parade, at which the children were invited to enter with their pets: cats, canaries, rabbits, ponies, and innumerable other animals took part in these parades. Children's races were held in the street, and pony rides were offered at low rates in the lot behind the church.

Formerly, a feature of the fair had been the fine line, sold at a special table at the Community House. At the time of the Italian fair, however, they were not of late autumn. Some of the articles sold at the street fairs were: milk, chocolate, delicacies, fine foods, milk, chocolate, delicacies, candy, ginger, ale, and lemonade.

This year, the St. James women decided to make a radical change in the execution of their bazaar. In the party, a grand dinner was held at the estate of Mr. and Mrs. George T. Hendrie; the bazaar itself was held in the late autumn, a time residents will remember their Christmas purchases.

The bazaar will be held in the parish house. Dinner will be served Friday evening, Oct. 24, and the fair will begin next day. The fair will be held at the Community House. The bazaar will be held in the parish house. Dinner will be served Friday evening, Oct. 24, and the fair will begin next day.
