"CAW, CAW!" IS KEY TO AL'S ANTICS

Al Capone, Jr., the pet crow belonging to Jim Packard, Harmon avenue, has gotten him into only a few months old and who came to Jim last spring (Jim Packard was a student at Cranbrook School) and was brought home by the owner, who has since then been working on his lawn. Al skipped over to watch him. "Good fellow," thought the crow when Mr. Brown's set of keys dropped out of his pocket. He snatched them at once. He could not catch him, had flown with them to the roof of the Packard house, where he was seen by him that they have not yet been found, even after extensive searches. Al made other crows expect the keys to his home and his car. This isn't the first time Al has been in trouble with a crow. He was once in a column in a Detroit daily a few weeks ago. "He isn't so different from other crows except that he is tame," Jim says. "He can't talk, but he eats hamburger."
