Excavation Of Ancient Egyptian City Described By Michigan Archeologist

Ann Arbor.—Ancient Karanis, desert city buried beneath centuries of debris and wind blown sand, is being excavated so thoroughly by the University of Michigan Egyptian expedition that visitors may traverse the streets and view the houses where 1,700 years ago some thousands of Egyptians went about their daily round of affairs, according to Dr. E. E. Peterson, in charge of the field work of the expedition, in an interview during a recent visit to the United States.

To preserve intact the remnants of this old culture, excavation is made carefully by means as primitive as those probably employed in building the city. Most of the diggers employed are natives from upper Egypt, numbering 40 men and older boys. The employment problem among the children of the region is largely eliminated by the use of from 300 to 400 in the removal of excavated material.

These boys average from 12 to 16 years of age, although very few know themselves just how old they are. Although they move 250 to 300 tons of earth a day, their labors are not especially arduous, since they carry only about 10 pounds in the baskets which they balance on their heads.

Scoffs At "Curse"

Incidentally Dr. Peterson scoffed at the idea that archeologists have anything to fear from mysterious deaths, such as the so-called "curse of King Tut," which was credited by superstitious persons with the death of Lord Carnarvon and others who died a few years after opening the tomb of Tutankamen. Lord Carnarvon died of a streptococcus infection of a common type, he said, and cited a serious infection contracted by a Michigan worker from a flea bite as an example of how the field worker in Egypt is exposed to dangers of this sort without bringing in supernatural explanations.

Why the city of Karanis was finally abandoned is more or less a mystery. For hundreds of years it was an important grain growing center for Egypt and later Rome, and consists, in fact, of several levels of towns which were built on the same site.

Possibly overtaxation during the days when Rome became ruler of the Egyptian territory, made it impossible for the peasants round about to farm profitably, so that they dispersed and the city died away as a trading center.

Public Officials Lax

Laxity on the part of public officials in the care of the canals which brought water from the Nile may also have been responsible. These canals furnished the life blood of this desert region, and when an able governor was in office he required the people to dig out the drifting sands and to remove the sedge grass which choked off the water flow.

During the terms of careless or dissolute officials, however, the canals fell into disrepair. Thus long continued neglect on the part of officials may have been the cause of the decline of and final abandonment of this desert town.
