ART and MUSIC

Have you a little Paderewski in your home?

You never can tell. It may be that your Wee Willie Winkie, even at the age of three, is a budding genius.

To enable parents to detect talent in very young children so that they may plan for their musical training and give them the advantage of a musical environment in their formative years an odd device has been invented.

Prof. Harold M. Williams of the University of Iowa child welfare research station, has produced an instrument which is said to record the rhythmic responses of children as early as three years of age.

It is a "rhythm hammer," which is offered to the child subject as a new type of toy. Given the hammer, the child to be tested is told to tap the hammer in time with the tick of a clock, which is electrically driven. Every time the child taps the hammer on a metal plate, an electrical circuit is completed causing an electro magnet to move a pen, which makes a dot on a circular paper graph placed on a phonograph instead of a record. On the graph a diameter is drawn.

If the child taps in unison with the ticking of the clock, the pen registers dots on the diameter of the graph. If the child taps out of time with the clock, the dot will not appear on the diameter.

The "rhythm hammer" test is supplemented by Professor Williams with a study of the child's development in pitch control, placing special emphasis on the measurement of control over musical intervals and the maintenance of tonality in the independent singing of simple melodies which the children have learned.

The Friend of Modern Art, recently formed as an auxiliary to the Detroit Museum of Art Founders' society to stimulate interest in present-day art in Detroit, has purchased and presented to the institute its first painting, chosen from the exhibition of modern French painting now being shown at the museum. It is Marc Chagall's "Snow-Covered Church."

Chagall, though numbered with the school of Paris, where he has spent much of his time and to which he tells us he "owes whatever he has done well" and which has been "the true school of his life and art," was born at Vitebsk, in Russia, in 1890.

It was the custom of medieval artists to depict Moses with horns. The colossal figure in the church of St. Pietro in Bincoli at Rome, regarded as Michelangelo's masterpiece, shows the Israelite leader with horns. It is described as a representation of the wrath of Moses when he came down from Mount Sinai, and found his people worshipping the golden calf. It has been explained that the horns were used to give an effect of strength, and this is supported by the fact that horn is frequently used in the Bible to mean strength. Bible scholars believe, however, that the mistake arose from a wrong translation of Exodus 34:29, 30, where it is stated that "the skin of his face shone."

From A WOMAN'S ANGLE

By MARJORIE ELAINE PORTER

The back seat driver has come to the front!

Women are better automobile drivers than men.

This from a man!

He is William L. Chenery, editor of Collier's Weekly. After making an analysis of motor accident records from 40 states, and allowing for the greater number of men drivers and the greater mileage covered by them, Mr. Chenery announces that women drivers were responsible for proportionately fewer injuries and deaths in 1930 than were men.

Set this to music and sing it to all the boys in your family.

For rare occupations for women, Miss Helen Case wins the blue ribbon. Miss Case is probably the only woman in the world to have trained a fighter for the prize ring.

Antone Poloni, who recently won the world's light heavyweight amateur boxing championship, was trained by Miss Case, who coached him in all his high school athletics in Ogden.

Frailty, thy name doesn't seem to be woman any longer!

—o—

Did you know that 22,000 American women served their country overseas in the World War?

They are planning to mobilize in Philadelphia from June 28 to July 2, when the Women's Overseas Service League makes camp for its annual convention.

If you aspire to be continental, don't appear on the tennis court in anything but white.

The smart French sportswoman chooses white for her tennis frocks because she knows that the most exclusive European clubs ban colored costumes on their courts.

—o—

At home, the independent English do as thty please.

On the lawn tennis courts of private estates, the British sportswoman chooses a cotton shirting frock in a pastel tint to harmonize with her pastel complexion, or she might favor a tub silk or printed Shantung.

—o—

In Birmingham you can be either Continental or British, but to be fashionable in any case, you will find cotton more popular than silk or wool this year for tennis.

—o—

The other day I dropped in to visit a friend, and found myself standing in the middle of a blue floor in her living room. Not a blue rug, nor a blue carpet, but blue wood.

"Can you tell me," I inquired, "in what marvelous Land of Oz you discovered these blue trees?"

"Blue trees! Don't you know good old fashioned maple when you see it!" she retorted.

"If that's good old fashioned maple, there's something wrong with my good old fashioned eyes," I told her.

"I know the wood is blue," she admitted. "But it didn't grow that way, silly, it is the newest thing. It is maple but it can be stained any color you wish."

And I discovered she is right.

By a new process of finishing, maple flooring can be colored by an acid stain, which incorporates color into the flooring as a basis for the color scheme of the room.

We recommend anything but red!

—o—

For many of us, these are maidless days. And so we are having a delightful opportunity to become better acquainted with the room between the back door and the dining room.

Our quaint ancestors used to call it "the kitchen."

Nowadays, it has developed into a cross between a Jack-in-the-Box and a kaleidoscope. A Jack-in-the-box because it has so many fold-up and spring-out features, and a kaleidoscope for its daring color schemes.

After considering 6,000 ideal plans in a house planning contest recently conducted, the judges' verdict was that the greatest demand seems to be for built-in kitchen features which can be put out of sight and out of mind (at times) by folding up.

The ironing board which springs in and out of its own cubby hole in the wall is already a taken-for-granted necessity, the plans showed.

Next to it, in popularity is the folding breakfast table.

As soon as the coffee "percs," the modern breakfast table springs out from the wall when we touch the right button.

Then we draw up the red, white and blue windsor chairs, get the waffle set out of the built-in cupboard, and—

"John, breakfast has been on the table half an hour, can't you come?"
