Let Your Garden Reflect Your Personality

OPEN YOUR EYES!
 There are millions of gold in the sunshine.
 There are diamonds enough in the dew!
 There's silver so bright in the frosty beads.
 In the sky there are turquoise of blue.

There are opals glaze in the sunset.
 There are sapphires bright in the sea;
 A ruby, so red, covers the grey treasure chest lies.
 There are emeralds green on the sea.

So then come, let's pretend that we're miners.
 We can find jewels and gold if we look!
 If you shine in the gleam of every sunbeam—
 There are sparkling gems in each nook.

There are millions of treasures in Nature
 That are ours—if you find them—to keep.
 But open your eyes! There the treasure chest lies.
 For you can not see Beauty and sleep!
 —MARJORIE ELAINE PORTER.

First of all, decide what type of garden you desire, the same as you would deliberate on an architectural plan in choosing a home. You would want your home to express the personality that is in you. Let your garden do the same. Try to weave yourself, your taste, your flower loves and pets in your garden scheme.

And don't confuse your type with the style of garden that is not expressive of your individuality. Pick your garden to suit your hat. Be sure it suits your style.

This advice does not apply to the pretentious garden alone. The same is true of the small informal garden. No matter how simple and unpretentious your grounds are to be, a plan made before the work is commenced will be your greatest aid in accomplishing pleasing results in the arrangement of your outdoor living room.

A plan is helpful, too, in that it serves as a measuring rod to prevent unnecessary mistakes and omissions. It will enable you to check over that which has been done. So complete your plans before you plant.

Now, about the type of garden for you as an individual. If you are the modish young madam of the present, you will want a garden that is "smart"; it must, in its expression, refinement, interest, "snap" or "style." Bits of interest in the right places in a garden are never-failing sources of pleasure to both owner and guest. A garden need not be large to express individuality, but it does require the personal touch.

Just as a person must have character and individuality, so interesting, so must the garden be characteristic of its owner. If you are not distinct in modern in type, but quaint and Dresden with a penchant for lavender and old lace, do not try to copy your modern neighbor's garden.

Be yourself. Have an old-fashioned garden. This does not mean that you must delve into garden history to discover rare specimens of antiquity. An old-fashioned garden is simply a garden composed of annuals.

Two or three generations ago, annuals were used almost exclusively. Now anyone can have an old-fashioned garden by including them. The garden of variegated blooms was much-favored in the past. To grow it is merely a matter of ordering supply of annual seeds and planting them in beds, pots, or boxes.

Perhaps you are a lover of nature in its wild forms, one who loves the informality of the woods rather than the somewhat stilted formal garden. Among the most interesting and wild gardens, is to many, the wild garden.

A great many native plants can be assembled and left to grow in their wild state. The interest in such a garden is due largely to the necessity of reproducing natural, uncultivated, yet well-kept and interesting. An old-fashioned garden is loved for its brilliant coloring.

In proportion to the color and sparkle of your personality should color be reflected in your garden.

Another thing to consider in planning the wild garden is permanency. Plants which bloom for one or two seasons and then die out, are not recommended. A successful garden of this kind should be perpetual, and the necessary care should never only the health of the plants and the prevention of undesirable plants or weeds from crowding out others.

But regardless of the type of garden you choose, if you love color, by all means, have it. And how easy it is to achieve! If you want more color in your home, it means repapering, repainting, or fussing with enamels and lacquers. But in the garden, the sky's the limit!

Color does not mean to attract attention by placing freakish and gaudy flower beds in front of your house, any more than you would sit on the porch conspicuously clad.

But the color that is the glory of roses and peonies, larkspur and delphinium is yours for the planting and welcome. Even the old-fashioned garden is loved for its brilliant coloring.

In proportion to the color and sparkle of your personality should color be reflected in your garden.
