FROM A WOMAN'S ANGLE

By MARJORIE ELAINE PORTER

If, in the world of shadows, the faces of those who signed the Declaration of Independence on that first memorable July, might again assemble, and pouring through the mists, consider today's problems, we wonder what the result would be. Imagine the scene: These chattering together, political, would be Benjamin Franklin and Stephen Hopkins.

Marjorie E. Porter, Rhode Island, the two eldest signers, comparing notes and exchanging words of wisdom.

"Something in this manner: 'I tell thee, Friend Franklin, says Hopkins, the Rhode Island farmer, 'our countryman are strange, very strange. What is this uproar coming from the earth, today about 'Wests and Dots? We had our Wiggs and our Tories, perfectly understandable political divisions. But today they ask not a man whether he be Whig or Tory, but whether he be Wet or Dry. Canst tell me?'"

"Yes, Friend, 'Franklin, the statesman, answers in the most manner: 'Tis a question of whether a man shall have his rum in the eyes of the law, or whether he shall take it secretly behind the law's back.'"

"Ram," Stephen Hopkins exclaims, "rum!" But who makes it a national issue! Surely there are other things of greater import. In truth, it is no question at all. I see it today, within the borders of the land, there are such problems as taxation, relations with other countries, and economic matters at home, for serious consideration."

"Yet, our compatriots seem to feel that all these matters hinge upon whether the country go wet or dry, as if the settlement of that question would solve all other problems."

"In our day, there were those who looked to the giving of rum to the Indians, but nowhere else in my recollection, did it raise its head to cause alarm."

"We did not consider it a matter for discussion, Friend Franklin. Why do not these people cease their childlike babbling about something that belongs only in a public house, and turn their attention to such affairs as treaties to prevent frontier wars with other nations, or to devise a plan whereby all men should have work and bread?"

BAKER KEEPS MIND OFF POLITICS

As Newton D. Baker continued to be mentioned as the strongest dark horse for the Democratic presidential nomination in Chicago, the former secretary of war re-maintained aloof from politics, as attested by the first performance of the summer opera in Cleveland. With him it shows his daughter, Margaret.
