Federal Kidnaping Law Seen Looming In Congress

Baby Lindbergh Outrage May Inspire Legislation With Death Penalty
By CHARLES P. STEWART
Central Press Staff Writer

WASHINGTON—One result of the Lindbergh kidnaping undoubtedly will be to include kidnaping among federal crimes before the present congressional session. Legislation to classify it as such already was pending, but without much prospect of passage until the Lindbergh outrage occurred.

NEVERLENS sentiment in favor of the jailing of the entire country from Washington is not dead. On the contrary it is stimulated by the transfer of almost every session of the national legislature of some additional crime from the local to the federal category.

Lawmakers with an acute perception of the rights normally opposed to so vigorous a centralization tendency but lend themselves to it under the stress of cases like the Lindbergh affair. Even with its existing medium of a police organization the federal government was enabled to bestir itself against the Lindbergh kidnaping through a network of agencies several thousand strong, including the justice department's bureau of investigation, the post-office inspection service, the prohibition, immigration and customs bureau, and the border patrol.

THE FEELING is understandable. Legislators are so infuriated that they want to vote for a law of their own expressive of their horror and indignation. If they recognize such atrocities as state offenses, however, they acknowledge their impotence to act. Hence their urge to federalize them to bring within range of congressional authority. The original suggestion was to classify federal kidnaping only those involving the transportation of kidnaped persons across state lines. Today the majority attitude seems to be to make the offense federal per se, regardless of any question of state boundaries.
