He had helped pick the potatoes for the Kovacses on their farm in Caro, and was returning with them to Detroit, although they did not know his full name and he could not be identified until the next day.

Both drivers were released after making statements to the prosecutor's office. Herbert Ireland said the lights on the truck were poor and that the truck was overloaded.

The accident was investigated by Coroner G. Dewey Kinnell and Deputies Louis Burr and Floyd Burger. Bloomfield Hills police were also called.

Cranbrook Foundation Surpasses Courts Of Renaissance Italy, Art Critics Say

"To be sure, a foundation like this establishes a precedent the like of which has not existed even in the most advanced cities of Renaissance Italy."

With this comment closes a description of Cranbrook Foundation by George L. Newhall, art critic in a recent issue of the magazine Life.

Mr. Lix devotes a half page in his regular monthly section in the magazine to a highly laudatory account of the work of the Foundation, and especially of the philanthropy of Mr. and Mrs. George G. Booth, donors of the project.

The article opens with comment on an exhibition of the work of Carl Milles, Swedish sculptor now resident at Cranbrook, who is "a sculptor and designer of fountains and garden sculptures," the critic says "the most outstanding artist of our times."

The account follows in full: An exhibition of the works of Carl Milles in the museum discussed Swedish sculpture (this is the same show Philadelphia in the year of the artist's coming to New York), induced us to take the dip under the East River, and submerge to Brooklyn. It is so far the most complete show of this artist's work in the United States.

At a sculptor and designer of fountains and garden sculpture he is the most outstanding artist of our times. He came to America upon the invitation of the Cranbrook Foundation, and it is this foundation I wish to tell about.

There were many attempts made both here and in Europe, to develop a national center which not only teaches, but also applies its teachings to the practical demands of life. I dare say the ideal solution is Cranbrook. The history of this foundation goes back about twenty-five years when George Booth (publisher of the Detroit News) bought some land in Bloomfield Hills and started an hour's drive from Detroit, for a private residence. Soon other Detroiters followed suit, and a school for children was needed. This little school quietly developed into something which today sounds less like reality than the utopian dream of an idealist.

First a school for boys and girls was added, then to encourage talented children, schools for different grades; later an art institution and art academy; and the whole foundation is founded out with a character of its own.

The characteristic part of Cranbrook is that it does not talk but creates art, and that it grew out of this beautiful hilly countryside by its own initiative. In 1926 the Finnish architect, Eilii Saarinen (who with his entry to the Chicago Tribune tower competition revolutionized the design of the modern skyscraper, was invited, and he started to build a building for the architect to work in.

From here the rest was slowly developed, built, decorated and furnished. Every piece of furniture, every rug, every lamp, and every wrought iron piece (this last is the specialty of Mr. Booth) is a product of the foundation, which gives the building to the world individuality—instead of, as is so common in other craft schools, encouraging the imitation of antiques.

I think that you will want to know that the whole foundation is a twelve million dollar out-right gift of Booth to American Culture. It is an open secret that, excepting their original home, the Booths kept nothing for themselves, and Cranbrook stands on its own grounds, and has its own board of directors. You can walk around the foundation for a couple of days, feeling as if in a great world, and finding a monument, memorial or dedication to this Philanthropy's unprecedented deed.

The school regularly invites the world's most outstanding artists to teach there by working out different projects. This is how Carl Milles came to America in the fall of 1930.
