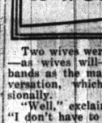
From A WOMAN'S ANGLE

By MARJORIE BLAIR PORTER

Two wives were talking one day —as wives will—with their husbands as the major topic of conversation, which happens occasionally.

"Well," exclaimed the younger, "I don't have to buy jig-saw puzzles. I married one! Just as soon as I think I have Dick all figured out something happens to show me I'm wrong. And those noble qualities I'd counted on turn out to be just so many missing pieces."



Marjorie E. Porter.

"You're telling me?" laugh, the other." Don't misunderstand me, I don't mean that your Dick is any more of a puzzle than the average husband. Because I don't believe he is, and I've been worrying about matrimonial jig-saws longer than you have. But what's the particular puzzle on your mind now?"

"Oh, it isn't important. It sounds silly when I try to explain, but it really seems serious when I sit thinking it over.

"You see, there are two hours in the day when Dick is as grouchy as a bear with a sore head. When he gets up in the morning, he's in the most impossible mood, and when he comes home from the office in the evening, he's no better.

"I'd as soon live on the desert with a cactus. And I just understand why he is that way! Of course, I know he has responsibility and not much business, but I can't do anything about it.

"Besides, I have troubles of my own. How would he like to shave at home all the time doing washing, and ironing—I wish he'd iron his own shirts once in a while—and—trying to provide the things the family likes to eat on a reduced budget, and taking care of the children—I try to make him see my side, I tell him . . .

"Just a minute," interrupted the elder matron, "I think I know what's wrong with your jig-saw puzzle.

"Is that the way you start and end the day, by reminding Dick of all the unpleasant tasks you have to do?"

—o—

"I never start anything. But when he's so grouchy and irritable, I can't stand it. Just last night I was going to say something to make him understand that life isn't a bowl of cherries—"

—o—

"So you hand him a bowl of razzberries for breakfast and dinner, and the diet doesn't agree with him. Can't you see, my dear, that if he seems cross and out-of-sorts in the morning, the thing to do is keep quiet.

—o—

"Be silently cheerful. Be sure to put just enough salt in his cereal, so that it is palatable. You must make good coffee. Have his eggs and bacon and toast, or whatever you have for breakfast, the way he likes them. And you've done your bit.

—o—

"When he comes in at night, do you have dinner ready?"

—o—

"Well, how can I? He seems to think I'm running an automatic lunch room, and that as soon as he puts his key in the front door, dinner should pop off the stove to the dining room table. No, I don't have it ready. I have so much to do that I'm usually finishing up ironing or cleaning when he comes in.

—o—

"Then I ask him to go down to look at the furnace, and he usually makes some remark about incompetent women who can't man age their homes, and that's too much for me."

—o—

"You don't have to tell me any more," her older friend interrupted. "And really, your case is very simple.

—o—

"Dick isn't the complex personality you think he is. Probably you're counting on some quality that makes him superhuman and not to be fuond in any mortal man under such circumstances.

—o—

"Now come down to facts. Do a little thinking about yourself, and forget Dick. Are you sure you couldn't improve upon yourself as a household manager?

—o—

"Get up earlier, work faster or figure out some other way, but do your work in the morning. After the lunch dishes are washed, let the job until about four, even if it's just to the grocery store to buy things for dinner.

—o—

"Then come home and have dinner ready, when Dick arrives. If you can't think of anything pleasant or impersonal to say to take his mind off his own affairs, don't say any thing. If conversation seems to annoy him, don't talk at all.

—o—

"Wait until he's had his dinner before you ask him to wrestle with the furnace. I'll admit that, in some instances, men are hard to figure out.

—o—

"But I must say, you've been building up your own mountain by heaping troubles on the molehill. You've been over-serving and over-protecting your husband to worship you like Patience on a Monument."

—o—

"Well, it's stupid to be a martyr. Remember what Dick is up against, and make a special effort to be like the girl he thought he was marrying at those critical hours in every married couples' day—in the morning, and when he comes home tired at night."

Fire Razes Home

The home of William Stevens and his son, Orville, on Boyd avenue, was destroyed by fire Saturday. The damage was estimated at $3,800.

The flames, discovered at 9:30 A. M., are believed to have been caused by a defective chimney. Efforts of both the Big Beaver and Clawson fire departments to extinguish the blaze were unavailing.

The house was covered by insurance, but the furniture, most of which was also destroyed, was not insured.

In Detroit Theaters

BONSTELLE CIVIC

"The Ticket-of-Leave Man," starring Millie Friz Scheff, is proving such a popular production with audiences at the Bonstelle Civic Theater that its run will be extended through Sunday night instead of closing Thursday. This occasion is taken by the management to change the regular opening night from Friday to Monday, as well as affording patrons another week-end to enjoy this hilarious revival of the sensational success of the '60's.

The first production under the new schedule will be "Bridal Wise," a comedy hit on Broadway last season, which will open Monday, continuing through Sunday, Jan. 22. Written by Frances Goodrich and Albert Hackett, authors of "Up Pops the Devil," "Bridal Wise" was used as a starring vehicle for the ever popular Madge Kennedy. Albert Hackett is a brother of Raymond Hackett who had leading roles at the Bonstelle in "Murray Hill" and "The Ticket-of-Leave Man."

Although this play is principally about marital infelicity, into it are woven some pleasant preachments against certain practical aspects of divorce. Alan and Joyce Barrow retire to a country estate so that husband can become a fox-hunting squire. But when his hunting cesses around one Babe Harrington, a devoted horsewoman, his wife

Madge Kennedy, Albert Hackett divorces him and goes off to marry the family lawyer. But the Barroughs have a son, a very bad small boy who makes himself detestable to all except his parents. The prospective foster-parents abuse him so that the estranged parents are drawn together in his defense, and the family is reunited through his perversity.

The nation's capital, Washington, was one of the few cities to show a gain in telephone service during 1931.
