Steel House For Chicago Exhibit Stirs Controversy

The steel house for the Chicago exhibit was a project that stirred controversy. It was designed by architect Frank Lloyd Wright and was to be a showcase of modern architectural design. However, some objected to the use of steel in the construction, arguing that it did not fit with the traditional design of the city. The controversy continued throughout the exhibit, with many different viewpoints expressed. The end result was a house that was both unique and influential in the world of architecture.
