Stewart Says Wallace Is On Defensive At Present

Believes Widespread Drought Makes His Program Look Ridiculous

By CHARLES P. STEWART, Central Press Staff Writer

WASHINGTON—Secretary of Agriculture Henry A. Wallace decidedly is on the defensive, in connection with his crop reduction program, which the spread drought certainly is beginning to make look mighty ridiculous, as to the wheat yield, anyway.

It is no secret that permanent officials in the agriculture department never think well of the plan.

While not in a position to be too critical of a administration policy, they also are exceedingly skeptical of the Henry A. Wallace proposition that much of the so-called wheat belt really is submarginal land, for crop-producing purposes, and ought to be surrendered back to cattle-raising.

As departmental wheat specialists, under pledge of strict anonymity, analyze the situation, most of the American wheat country always has been a region in which not more than one big harvest in three or four seasons could be depended on, but when a season has been really super-satisfactory, the harvest has been sufficient to make up for the scanty ones, maintaining a good general average.

To adapt himself to soil and climate conditions of this character, however, the wheat belt farmer must plant his acres regularly up to the limit; otherwise, when he does have a bumper-crop year, he won't get the benefit of it.

In other words, he imperatively needs a surplus, whenever nature permits him to accumulate one. If a system of restrictions upon his plantings prevails, he will not harvest much in poor years, and when he has a good year, he will not harvest much either, because his planting will have been restricted. In short, he can prosper by reducing irregularity to an average, which artificial regulation upsets, and ruins him.

Agriculture's friends do agree that the farmer is in great need of governmental aid to save him from the necessity of sacrificing a big crop when he harvests one.

Assume that he has a productive year. Prices consequently are low, but the farmer is hard up and must sell for what he can get, to meet pressing obligations.

The ensuing two or three years are poor years, maybe, and the carryover from the good year becomes extremely valuable, but the speculator, who acquires the good years' yields, profits by the price advance; not the farmer.

The late President Alexander Legge of the International Harvester company, as chairman of the Federal Farm board, did his utmost to establish a set-up to meet this difficulty, but the time for it apparently was not ripe. Besides, as Legge told me, he was fought at every turn by special-interest groups, which obviously would be cut off from a source of huge revenues, if such a plan were adopted.

George N. Peek, first AAA director, also was so bitterly opposed to acreage limitations and plowings under that he was sidled out of his position in the Tugwell program. Oh, there is plenty of expert dissent from the philosophy of Mr. and Mrs. F. F. McKinney at reduction of production.

Cotton plowings under haven't given desired results, either; intensified cultivation of the cotton which wasn't plowed under has offset them.

Swine raisers likewise are discontented. They have been paid by the government for the young pigs they destroyed instead of marketing, but they have received less than the market price for the less for the grown animals that they did market.

And now tobacco growers are raising the point that lower cigarette prices, to encourage smoking, probably would serve their purpose better than higher prices stimulated by a curtailment in the supply of tobacco.

Four kinds of farmers were to have been helped by production cuts: Wheat growers, tobacco growers, cotton planters and hog raisers.

For a while the outstanding miscalculation in connection with this quadruple experiment at countering the forces of nature seemed to be in the field of swine raising.

But this was before the drought had blighted the wheat crop. The cotton crop fooled the calculators in a way they had not expected; it didn't cut down as they had anticipated.

Taxation is a factor in the tobacco growers' problem. The impost on the weed is so high that they reckon its consumption is being held at a minimum.
