Child Not Well Trained If He Becomes Homesick

BY GARRY C. MYERS, PH. D.
Hood Department Parent Education, Cleveland College, Western Reserve University

ANY PARENT who has a daughter entering college last fall has since been asked, "Has she been homesick?" or, "gives her heart to go back?" a few days after Christmas.

And there are more homesick youth than some realize, so homesick that they, after several weeks in college, returned home with health "too ill to continue"—so reported to the relatives and neighbors.

A good many tears were shed by youth and parents when he or she went back to college—much in all for the pillars of salt the size of Lot's wife.

Whether tears were shed or hearts ached when sons and daughters left for college or elsewhere, depended entirely on the home education up to the time of the first leave-taking. Parents who prepare themselves and their children for sensible stoicism from the start, and who find no good-by tears when the child two of them. They never cultivate too close emotional ties to mother. Early the infant learns to smile good-by as his mother leaves him for the market, and he learns to be comfortable or happy with any competent substitute for several hours, even several days. As a runabout and adolescent, the well-reared child has practice at leaving home with friends at first, later with strangers, and finally, if possible, in a summer camp.

No home so poor that self-reliance and emotional independence are not possible. Usually it is in homes of the well-to-do that children grow emotionally overdependent.

On the other hand, there are many college youth whose ties to home are so completely severed, who grow almost as detached as to write home frequently for more money, who feel no emotional association with a sense of obligation and consideration for their parents who have sacrificed for them. All too many college youth last Christmas vacation almost entirely ignored their parents, and were home for the rest of the family were asleep, merely used the home as a place to sleep at night.

Unfortunately the young man and woman who find no pleasure in giving pleasure to his parents.
