Journalists Wonder If Youth Has Too Much Leeway In Washington

Central Press Washington Bureau 1000 S street.
 By CHARLES P. STEWART
 Central Press Staff Writer
 WASHINGTON.—The question, "Is youth, perhaps, being given rather more votes than it is entitled to, in New Deal councils?" is one which occasionally is being raised by Washington's journalistic observers of the national administration's recovery activities.

It is a query which has been heard with increasing frequency following the selection of President Robert M. Hutchins of the University of Chicago for the key post in connection with NRA code enforcement.

Professor Hutchins was a recent visitor in the capital—and taller at the White House. The correspondents did not see much of him; he did not prove to be all that readily accessible. Still, the scribbles arrived at a certain estimate of him. They take him, unmistakably, to be an exceedingly smart young man (he is in his late middle 30's), but decidedly marked by the cock-sureness which many of the older generation of reporters associate with a measure of immaturity.

SOME SEE OWN ERROR
 True, the older generation of newspaper men, as well as the older generation of politicians and of business leaders, are in no position to lay claim to any superior quality of intelligence, considering the frightful jam that their management has run the whole world into.

Nevertheless, they themselves were youngish men in their day when they were sowing the wind that they and their children now are reaping, as an economic whirlwind.

Some of them see their error. Not all, of course. Plenty of mentalities cease to develop at 50 or 45 or earlier, and progressively solidify thereafter, indefinitely. Equally indefinitely, however, the mind which remains susceptible to new impressions should broaden with experience. A few old men's minds do.

HARD-BOILED YOUTH
 Now, a man of 35 or 40 (and 45 is young for an individual in national public life) can't possibly have had the experience of a man of 50 or 60 or 70—provided that the man of 50 or 60 or 70 has retained the mental fluidity to continue to assimilate his successive experiences, as he has encountered them.

Speaking personally, having seen a Washington newspaper man 20 years ago, I know that my economic status is not as good today as it was then, and, more or less, I know why, having watched the evolution of economic events in the meantime.

A Washington newspaper man of 35, at the present juncture, who was only 15 two decades ago, can't imaginably understand the transformation which has been wrought in those two decades, as well as I do. In fact, he doesn't like that there has been a transformation. But, in general, he thinks he comprehends it all. Indeed, he probably is more positive about it than I am. It's youth that's hard-boiled. Age, if it has credit by experience (which not all of it has, by any means), is tolerant.

BRASH AND SASSY
 The incoming generation indisputably is entitled to complain that its preceding generation has scandalously mismanaged the world's affairs, but that isn't true of the present incoming generation alone; it has been true of every incoming generation, back to the dawn of history. The present incoming generation undoubtedly will be cursed similarly by the succeeding incoming generation.

The younger New Deal crowd tries to be, in short, as a little too brash and sassy.

I can sympathize with the old-timers' complaints of the "brain trust"—in its early 40's, and now, maybe, in its mid-30's. It's unjustly "fresh" and certain of itself. If it had been on the job in 1914 and 1920, would it have done any better? In 1954, or thereabouts, won't it be on the par as such as today's passing generation is now?

I'd like to hear from representatives of both generations on the subject.

CONTAGIOUS CASES REPORTED LAST MONTH
 The September report of the city health department, approved by the City Commission Monday night, shows that 10 cases of contagious diseases were reported to the department during the month. These included five cases of poliomyelitis, two of chicken pox, two of mumps and one of scarlet fever.

THIEF STALS PURSE
 A thief who reached his hand through a window of the home of Webb, 228 Bird avenue, made off with a purse containing $125 in cash, two handkerchiefs and a driver's license, Mrs. Webb reports, to police Sunday night.

New Dairy Firm To Open Saturday
 Opening of Nott's Dairy, at 411 East, Maple avenue, a new firm which will act as distributors here for Romeo Creamery products, has been set for Saturday morning. It was announced yesterday by the owner, Perry A. Nott, of Romeo.

In handling Romeo Creamery products, the new dairy will be resuming a service formerly conducted by the Birmingham Creamery, but discontinued about a month ago. Continued demand for the products has led to the formation of the new company, Mr. Nott said.

The dairy will handle butter, milk, cream, fresh eggs and cottage cheese, and will operate a daily home delivery service.
