Imagine the embarrassment of Supervisor Perry A. Vaughan of Bloomfield Township when he discovered that the voters of his bailiwick Tuesday had decided by a big majority to send him as their delegate to the county Republican convention, but that at the same time he received four votes as the Democratic delegate—being three more than anybody else received; "I only hope the two conventions don't come on the same day," Parry hoped.

The Drum and Bugle Corps of the Charles Edwards Post of the American Legion is preparing to enter the state-wide competition to be held at Travers City Friday in connection with the Legion's annual state convention here this weekend. The local corps, with Howard Wendorff as commander, finished 11th in a field of 21 competing organizations from all over the state at the Michigan State Fair in Detroit last week.

LABOR CRISIS LAID TO NRA

Workers Blame It For Failure To Avert Friction With Capital

By CHARLES P. STEWART
Central Press Staff Writer
WASHINGTON—NRA is blamed by the generality of the employing class representatives, who are numerous in Washington, in connection with strike negotiations, for the spread of labor trouble throughout the country.

Charles P. Stewart

The workers' spokesmen do not exactly blame the National Recovery Administration, but they do say that increasing friction between capital and labor conclusively demonstrates the set-up's inability to accomplish what its creators hoped it would accomplish. From talks with leaders on both sides of pending issues, it is quite evident what the basic difficulty is, and that is the NRA's refusal to improve labor's status, including the taking up of the slack of unemployment, at the sacrifice of a considerable part of capital's profits—not its profits during the depression period (an interval during which perhaps it hasn't reaped any), but its future profits, in comparison with its old-time profits, when industry was prosperous.

And capital refuses to make the sacrifice. NRA Administrator Hugh S. Johnson certainly never shared the executive mansion's belief that I am one of those who feel that labor is entitled to the profits of production. But I'm not positive that the demand for a larger share of the profits and labor is endeavoring to obtain, by the strike method, what the White House wanted to have—a larger share of the profits of production.

capital WOULD submit to any sacrifice. It was obvious from the first that the general, as a practical industrialist, knew what his fellow industrialists' attitude would be, and was trying to tackle the situation from a different angle.

The general's notion was that in industrial concerns might be effected which would enable the employing group to treat labor more liberally WITHOUT sacrificing any of their profits—this possibly making ever more money than previously.

Maybe the general's plan WOULD have worked if the general had been permitted to apply his principles 100 per cent, but to have done so would have involved the trustification of all industry.

The White House balked at such a contract. On the opposite hand, the executive mansion's philosophy might have been vindicated if the executive mansion could have eliminated the element of selfishness from capital.

It has been revealed, however, as yet, that the general can't be eliminated. The result is a deadlock. Strikes are a manifestation of an effort to break the deadlock.

In short, General Johnson's plan has failed, because the country declines to be completely trustified. Red labor is endeavoring to obtain, by the strike method, what the White House wanted to have—a larger share of the profits of production.

From Bay de Finie we visited Collins and Killarney, and many places, all of which are lovely to behold. Rough weather attended a major part of the cruise, but the quality of the proved her mettle by plowing right through without any trouble, although Messrs. Thompson and Hawthorne did take to their starboard on several occasions. It was a great hospitality of the Captain Hoef, if you own a yacht, and haven't yet visited the Manitowish waters, you have a treat waiting for you. We met numerous Detroit Yacht Club craft, including the Larus, owned and captained by Mr. and Mrs. Al Clark, of Adams and Long Lake roads.

This undent a brief narrative of a lovely summer cruise... Belated to you and your future voyagers to you and your incomparable Ekkip!
