WITH THESE 5 LIGHTING ESSENTIALS

Young eyes need the best of care in early years... because at this stage a child's inquisitive mind is leading him into the realm of books. More and more time is spent in reading—and because of this fact, there is danger of permanent injury to eyesight if proper lighting is not provided. Abuse of the eyes through poor lighting results in eyestrain and near-sightedness. Figures show that one out of every five school children has defective vision.

You can easily make sure that you have good home lighting by following these five simple rules. (1) Use correct size lamp bulbs—"WATTS." In table and floor lamps with three sockets, use 40 watts in each socket; with two sockets, 60 watts; with one socket, 100 watts. (2) Have at least one-tenth as much light in the rest of the room as you have on your book, newspaper, shade, etc. (3) Use SHADES on all lamp bulbs to prevent GLARE. (4) Use shades with light-colored linings to get the most light. (5) Have enough lighting fixtures or portable lamps to insure the proper intensity of light throughout the room.

These 5 principles will assure reasonably good lighting and will provide proper seeing conditions for every member of your family.

Speaker Describes Battles Of Wits Behind War Lines

An attentive audience, including a number of ranking officers of the Michigan National Guard and the Officers' Reserve Corps, heard Col. M. D. Mills tell of "The Battle Operations of 1918 on the Western Front" at a public meeting in the Community House Friday evening. The affair, sponsored by the Charles Edwards Post of the American Legion, of which Colonel Mills is a member, and followed a pot-luck supper at the Legion Home on South Woodward avenue, attended by members of both of the local veterans' organizations.

Colonel Mills, who served on the general staff of the A. E. F., and later on the general staff of the U. S. Army, and who is a graduate of the Army War College and president of the Michigan Reserve Officers' Association, talked on the strategic significance underlying actual engagements and movements of troops, a phase of warfare not as widely known as the personal experiences of the men on the firing line.

The workings of the "master plan" were made clear to the layman as well as to the student of military affairs. No doubt there were doughboys in the audience who never before understood why they had been forbidden to pursue an advantage or, on the other hand, to retreat under overwhelming odds.

Although the talk centered on the operations of 1918, bearing on the final outcome of the war, Colonel Mills began with the German plan laid long before August, 1914, to commence operations in Alsace-Lorraine. In this, the speaker said, the Germans counted on the French desire to regain that territory, and at the same time threatened Paris at the rear.

The plan was gradually to lead ground to the French, drawing them away from Paris while a strong German force swept southward through Belgium, to attack the French capital behind the backs of its supposed defenders. Apparently the enthusiasm of the German forces, or of their commanders, would not permit them to yield, and Paris quickly became aware of the horde pouring in from the north, thus defeating the plan.

As each major engagement was thus shown in its relation to the controlling plans of either side, Colonel Mills' audience became increasingly aware of the importance of generalship. It became evident that the finest of man power, plus ships, munitions and other supplies, though vitally necessary to victory, would have been useless without leadership superior to that of the enemy and aided by a superior Intelligence Service.

An especially entertaining story of the battle of wits that took place behind the lines was that of the "sightseeing" mobilization. American troops in large numbers were rushed to a concentration point near the German lines. There was "undirected" talk by their commanding officers, forecasting the drive that was planned. A new piece of carbon paper, used only once to copy orders, was "accidentally" torn, crumpled and thrown into a hotel waste basket. When this carbon paper reached German headquarters, reserves were rushed to the spot—but the real offensive took place miles away, as planned.
