Mother Should Discipline Child If Dad Is Too Severe

By GARRY C. MYERS, PH. D.
Head Department Parent Education Cleveland College, Western Reserve University.
LINCOLN STEFFENS, in his autobiography, tells of when he was about four, his mother, much to his surprise, spanked him.
"I saw my father come around the corner after me. I dropped the reins and climbed down off the wagon. My mother took my hand and, without a word, led me home. There at the door my mother caught me up away from my stern father and, carrying me off into the parlor, laid me across her knees and gave me a spanking, my first. My mother! I had expected punishment, but from my father, not from her. I felt saved when she rescued me from him. And then she did it—hard. . . . She said that my father stood at the door, watching her till she was done with me, and then he asked her why she did it.
"I did it," she said, "to keep you from doing it. You are so hard."
Here, it seems to me, is a practical suggestion for the mother who so often must suffer with the child cruelly punished by the father. Perhaps she could save the child from such whippings, were she to be more exacting of him herself. There might be times, indeed, when effective punishment from her would keep the father from administering any.
Scores of fathers will whip a child just because they are angered at the mother who, they think, has pampered him. I'm not defending this type of father. I'm merely describing him. Then the mother, by way of compensation, which may be unconscious on her part, will pamper the child more, causing the father to grow still more harsh. Occasionally, of course, the relationships are reversed, when the mother is the more severe—but not so often, I suppose.
Many a long-standing father-mother tension could be loosened if the more lenient parent were willing to stand a touch more sternly in matters of discipline, in which event the other would grow less severe, and the child would profit.
For the child's sake, and for marital harmony, it is very essential for parents, even before the first child is born, certainly before he acquires locomotion, to work out together a practical program on managing the child, one on which they can agree and are willing to abide consistently. And often it means considerable compromise. Even then, times will arise when these parents will differ, and when feelings will run strong. How much more serious are such problems in the family where the parents never have made an honest effort to arrive at an agreement on such vital issues. The half has never yet been told about the tragedies in homes incident to parent-parent disagreement.
Mrs. R. W. Voorhis of Kennesaw drive returned Monday after a month's visit in southern Florida.
