Guest With Spoiled Child Tries Patience Of Hostess

BY GARRY C. MYERS, PH. D.
Head Department Parent Education, Cleveland College, Western Reserve University

MANY ARE THE times when you are turning up inside with rage while you are trying to be a gracious hostess to a mother with a spoiled child.

The child pulls down your books and tears them; breaks your vase or dishes; climbs upon your chair and jumps upon your davenport.

When a young child shares his toys with the little guest, they are broken right before the owner's eyes. The mother of the young destroyer sits calmly by or faintly speaks in vain.

You wish you had the opportunity to turn that mother's child across your knee and to give him about 20 burning spans. On second thought, however, you don't blame the child; you know that he is only doing as he has been used to do.

Blame Mother
You turn your feelings toward the mother; you hold her responsible, although you do not dare tell her. Your experience is to be a good hostess causes you to hold your tongue and commands you to do your best not to seem disturbed. What a relief to you when they leave!

How strange it is that some women, who are very correct in all matters of conversation or social niceties, are very rude when they go dealing with their little child.

You have been doing some thinking, making up your mind that no child of yours will ever be "such a nuisance." You have resolved that before you go dealing with your child he will have learned to handle things with reasonable care, will have learned that there are some things he must not have and some things he must not do.

Will Obey 'No'
He will have learned what "No" means, and you will have acquired the skill of diverting him from things to which he is dangerous, to safer kinds of amusements. You may even take your toys along with you.

If you have been full of good suggestions to the child, turning him to safe and useful plays, at the times when he is most likely to get into trouble, and if in emergencies the word "No" is accepted by him from you as final, the guidance of your child, when you take him away from home, will be easy.

The danger is that you will say "No" many times too often. It is surprising how rarely this word needs to be used by the skillful mother, who knows her child and who always is turning him to activity which he enjoys without annoyance to anyone.
