Make Child's Punishment Businesslike, Begs Advisor

By GARRY C. MYERS, PH. D. Head of Department of Psychology, Cleveland College, Western Reserve University

FREQUENTLY those writers who tell parents never to spank a child to restrain him, advise parents to punish the child by refusing to talk to him, in order to make him sorry for some misdeed. Accordingly, the child is to be estranged and treated as unfit to be talked to or shown the usual family endearments.

Such advice seems to me very unwise. When you act toward a child as if he has misbehaved as "mad at him," how is he going to see the difference between your attitude and the attitude of a playmate who says, "I am mad at you?"

If by exercise of emotional expression we could turn on or off our feelings of anger at a child, as we turn on or off a light, this disrecommended mode of discipline might be good, but no one so completely masters his emotions, feelings and their expression tend to go on and on indefinitely, and to grow more or less intense, shifting in all sorts of ways.

By a light quivering aspen made.

Make Punishment Businesslike

Hard enough to manage our emotions under ordinary situations. How much harder when we purposely employ them to punish! When your child does something you are sure is wrong, and for which you are also sure he should be punished, administer the punishment (other than by turning up his heart-strings or by fanning your own wrath), in as businesslike fashion as possible, and make sure he knows as well as you do, just when the punishment is ended. Then manage yourself so well that the matter never is brought up again. Remember it against him no more. Show him the same consideration, and react to his personality exactly the same as if he had never done the wrong. To do so is to manifest a spark of the Divine. To do otherwise is to act childish and childish things. (A luncheon, however.)

Have we parents really grown up? I suppose that none of us acts at all times as if he had. With our temptations to be childish toward our children, why should parent educators try to make us be more childish than we are?
