ATHER around here and give an ear to a tale of terror form Julia Maleski—Mrs. Michael Maleski, that is, of West Newton, Pa. Julia, I'd say, went through a healthy dose of the worst kind of terror there is—the fear of a mother for the safety of her child. Read this story carefully, you mighters—for the thing that happened to Julia is at hing that could have happened to anyone. To you—or to your neighbors across the street. Look over Julia's yarn, and you may save yourself the same sort of agong some day, say anyone for the work, and her fitteen-monthod son, Stanley, was playing on the floor mearby while she started to straighten up the bedroom.

She began by taking all the tolet articles off the dresser and putting them on the bed. There was a pin cushion among these things she placed on the bed. Julia had god cause to remember that later.

Stanley Pushed the Door Shut.

Then she had finished with that, Julia opened the windows wide taked to sweep. The baby toddled along behind her wherever she Half way through the sweeping. Julia noticed a coat that had off a hanger in the clused, and went in to pick it up. She had bary inside when BANOI went the closet door. Little Stanley, follow-

There are a hundred and I had to watch him all the time.

"Then another terrifying thought occurred to me. Was my hall or closed or open. He might fall down the sharrs and be killed—and helpless to do anything about it."

Julia began booking around then, for some way out of that closef, was dark in there, and the darkness added to her terror. SHE

Sill no answer—not even the slightest sound to indicate that the baby was still alive. Maybe, she thought, something has happened to him already. He might even then be tying at the bottom of the stair—or in the yard down below.

"I was desperale," says Julia. "By that time, my eyes had gotten do to the dark, and I happened to look up. Three, in the ceiling of the set, I saw a square hole, covered with a small door. Then I rembered. It was the trap-door leading to the attic. Just a small ening about two feet square. If I could only get up there.

"I am stout, weetsjung a hundred and saty bounds, and how I ever through that opening. I don't henselly know. It took me a full half by the state of the state of the saw of the same and t
