Leslie Howard has refused, once and for all, to allow his daughter, Leslie Ruth, to make "National Velvet" for Paramount, if you heard her on the air with her father you'll recall what an excellent actress she was on the air. The story calls for a young girl—and Leslie Ruth Howard is just thirteen, which seems to be the lucky age for motion picture and radio debutantes this year. But papa says no.

They're still searching for the right girl to play the heroine of "Gene with the Wink" whereby a young actress who has proved her ability on the stage, but has never made a picture. The question is—would the public go in greater numbers to see the picture if a well known actress played the lead, or is the story big enough so that, if it is unknown girl goes against performance, the crowds would go anyway?

Maude Blue, a favorite with film fans for many years, plays the lead in a picture that rekindles the pioneer agricultural work of a century ago. He has the role of John Deere, in "The Blacksmith's Girl," a story which recounts the life and times of the man who gave to the world the steel plow. The action takes place in 1837 in the Illinois of Abraham Lincoln's day.

Mary Rogers, daughter of the beloved Will, has gone to work at the Twentieth Century-Fox studios where her father made pictures, and has the bangalow dressing room which he used, and with no one else has had since his death.

The beautiful Mary deserves a lot of credit. Her father's influence would have helped with a movie career, but she went out and got theatrical experience instead.

When you see "White Hunter" sympathize with Warner Baxter and June Lang in the scenes where they battle against a tropical hurricane. The hurricane was made right in the studio, of course, but was none the less violent because of that. Baxter and Miss Lang spent a whole day with that storm, what with rehearsal and retakes and one thing and another, and were black and blue when it was over, where they had been bruised by objects blown against them by the wind.

ODDS AND ENDS . . . It cost Trever $20,000 to visit her parents recently; she'd have received that sum for making a picture for an outside studio, when she finished "Career Woman" . . . The color in "The Garden of Eden" . . . and Charles Bower's performance is excellent . . . Madeline Dietrich's makes you wish the bullet had been able to get the role away from Merle Oberon . . . When Eleanor Powell arrived in New York some time ago she gave an exhibition of tap dancing in the railway station, to the delight of the crowds.
