"Stealing Increases In Best Families"—Myers

AS I GO ABOUT my city, I frequently inquire of merchants concerning the conduct of children in their stores. This I have done in a great many cities, especially in suburban and other residential areas. I assume, of course, that from children who have not had reasonable opportunities, or whose parents have not held them to a standard of responsibility and leadership, one should not expect so high grade conduct as from children of the comfortable and well to do.

Among the latter there have been more with good family backgrounds, as a rule, more in homes of culture and refinement and, we hope, with good ideals of citizenship. They are looked upon to be initiated by the former. We should like to think that children from the more privileged homes could practice better habits of citizenship than those from their parents' stores would be all-around of. What do I find? Everywhere the neighborhood merchant speaks discouragingly. He says that stealing and injury of small articles of merchandise are appalling on the increase. I lately heard a hardware merchant and the next door druggist talking about the matter. Said the hardware man, "I don't like to say it, but I dread to see children enter my store. Many of them steal things or handle them so roughly as to render them unsalable."

"Steal From Drug Store," was the reply. "Kids are always stealing things from us, and if we catch one in the act and report him to his parents, we lose a customer. The attitude is, 'That was just a kid trick.'"

Recently a manager of a chain drug store in a large metropolitan area told me that it is not the children of the poor who trouble their stores with stealing, but children of the well-to-do. "They think it smart. Over in our store to buy favored section, we can't trust the kids at noon to pay their soda bills at the cash register. They get the money from their mothers immediately when they are served at the counter. I have observed that in the store on a boundary between a very good child and a poor one, it is the children from the 'good' ones who give us little trouble."

Now, however, the "good" ones have been the most eager followers of the prophets of a re-education. The history of this day will have been written, pilfering and vandalism by children of the well-to-do. The credit of those clever writers and teachers who have been telling parents that their kids ought to be taught the meaning of and regard for the rights of others, at the very age the foundation of good citizenship can most easily and effectively be laid.
