Bugs
By James J. Montague

I AM told that some scientists believe that long after you have perished from the earth, the soil will continue to prosper and increase. It really was not necessary for scientists or any one else to tell me that. I have been convinced of it ever since I began to live in a small town and undertake to raise a small garden.

At the beginning it was partly a vegetable garden. I had heard that the vegetables are really good crops which fresh from the soil, and that these are little more than second rate unless raised by one's self. So I bought seeds and fertilizer and curious tools and fell to work with a hand book on the rearing of vegetables for reference purposes. I prepared a bed, worked it and the soil with extensive chemicals. The book instructed me to buy, and planted, possibly in a million words. Then pretty well spent by my exertions. I waited for the fruit of my labors to become ripe for the harvest.

It was then I discovered that the adage to the effect that everything comes to him who waits was intended by some mischievous spirit who had a grudge against his fellow man, and well understood how to sow it. I waited. But the bugs didn't. First came the cut worms, which like burglars never go out on their jobs till after nightfall. Then they cattered together in the night. First come the cut worms, which like burglars never go out on their jobs till after nightfall. Then they cattered together in the night. ## the MODERN GAS RANGE

After you have learned, as you must, that flowers and vegetables are becoming extinct on the earth you may decide to provide pleasant surroundings by raising a lawn. While you make the lawn, let it be covered by some mysterious air telegraph to a growing army of beetles, which, driven out of Asia by overcrowding, stand at bay on freight vessels and came East to grow up with the country. Arriving on the Pacific coast, the beetles disembarked across the country till they reached Chicago, and then, wishing one another good luck, proceeded fan wise eastward. Some of them were on the alert, and they intended to climb the stately eastern oaks, and despite them of veridical, often overnight. But here man was on the alert, and he took his fine tin tree top or three hundred years to grow to important size, and many of them, cattle of their estates of the insected class. Spraying machines were bought and put to work and gradually the beetles became exterminated.

But with them came cousins of theirs who fed on grass. These Insect Nephew-in-laws, as soon as they found a stretch of greenward, dug in and left baby grubs about six inches under the soil. When these hatched and landed, about them for foliage they decided that the young grass roots were excellent eating, and that they made a most excellent article of greenward, dug in and left baby grubs about six inches under the soil. When these hatched and landed, about them for foliage they decided that the young grass roots were excellent eating, and that they made a most excellent article of greenward.
