STAR DUST Movie - Radio

THERE is a fortune waiting for anyone who can write short sketches, or plays, which can be done on the radio. Practically every actor and actress who isn't broadcasting wants to try it. Hollywood is full of people who know something on the screen and yearn to do the same on the air.

Now that spring of the stage and the radio have shown that they can walk into a movie studio and become a success, practically overnight, no motion picture star is so secure as he was in the old days. And the only remedy for that is to be a radio star.

For example, take our friend Mr. Robinson, of "Little Caesar" fame. When he was on the Valley floor recently, he had to fall back on a sketch that had been done not too long ago. He was in a quandary. If a memory not backed up by notes is reliable.

So both in Hollywood and New York, anyone who can manage a typewriter is being requested to begin for "something I can do on the radio." If you can fill that demand, go ahead, and good luck to you.

The Grandchildren By James J. Montague

MY WIFE and I always said that grandchildren would be wonderful to have around the house. They didn't come for a visit, of course, unless they are perfectly well, which insures you against worry before bedtime, as you don't have to think up animal stories to put them to sleep, although, come to think of it, I never knew a kid who would shut an eye while an animal story was being told. They are at their best when they are a little afraid of elderly relations, such as grandparents, and are more likely to be on their good behavior. And you can feed them candy and things they like with impunity, because the doctor hasn't given you any dietary for them and they won't get the stomachache till after they get back to their fathers and mothers, anyway.

That was what my wife and I always said. But we don't say it any more. Similarly our daughter had a chance to run down to Atlantic City for the week-end and wondered if we could look after the two kids. We were delighted, of course. The could say, being them right over. It would be better to have them. Just send along a list of what they were allowed to eat, and leave the rest of it to us. The youngsters, aged three and one and a half, arrived, under escort the following afternoon. It was thought best not to tell them that their mother was going away, so while the boy, Cubby, was amusing himself by chasing the cat, she slipped off. Hardly had she come before Sister, the girl, asserted a joint claim on the cat, and attempted to enforce it by laying a firm hold on its tail and wrenching it away from her brother. A crisis occurred instantly. Distrustful of a person who would attack him in the face, the creature clung to Cubby, sinking her claws into the sleeves of his little jacket, though which they protruded just far enough to bring a terrific howl from him.

The feline that we applied to the scratch brought forth another and a louder howl, but several selections from the bag of candy were brought home was balm for the hurt wound. Meanwhile Sister concealed herself under a reading table, from which she presently emerged with an angelic smile and headed for the dining room, where she began inventing a bowl of gold fish. In an effort to escape them, Sister, sinking her claws into the sleeves of his little jacket, though which they protruded just far enough to bring a terrific howl from him.

By this time I was beginning to wonder if it had been the best of judgment to entertain these young people. It also occurred to me that the idea that they could take young children or leave them alone wasn't so good. Of course we had gone through the same kind of an experience with our own offspring, but that was so to speak, under compulsion.

The afternoon was difficult. For a time the angels worked in perfect harmony, and agreeing like birds in their little nests. Then Cubby, owing to a fortuitous reason, took his sister's ears, and, though only a year and a half, would resemble with a fierce little tie that came to her hand, such as a wooden horse or a toy umbrella. We began to look forward to nightfall. But that blessed relief still lay beyond a sea of troubles.

Call came. Childless call. They arrived in the midst of a dis- agreement over the possession of a banana which Cubby had discovered in a foraging expedition to the kitchen. The view under way were plain. But his sister dismounted. She had few words, but she used those with consequence. One of them was "No, No!" which she screamed at the top of her voice every time Cubby standing about on a chair sought to take a little out of his plate. The other was "Bad, Bad!" which she uttered whenever we began to look forward to nightfall. But that blessed relief still lay beyond a sea of troubles.
