Most of America's gold is now concentrated at Fort Knox in underground chambers. If any "rats" (as G-Man Hoover calls agnaters) attempt to burrow for it, they can be drowned out by the pressing of a bitton which will let in water from the surround-ing moat.

Something similar happens when wealth becomes to concentrated in the hands of the few. A revolution takes place and it is scattered, only to be gathered again by others.

Is this gathering and dispersing a universal law?
Water is caught up and concentrated in clouds. It is dispersed in rain and so on, ad infinition. Every living plant, tree and animal is a gathering of atoms (which are again dispersed at death.)
What would happen if all the gold at Fort Knox and all the gold France has buried beneath the Seine, and all the gold all over the world were buried where it couldn't be regained,—would we be any worse off?
