Mack Puppets To Perform For Book Circus Group At Library

The "Book Circus," conducted at the Baldwin library by Miss Ruth Poucher, is going to have a party at the library this Saturday, at 2 p. m. It's going to be a fine party, and every "patron of the circus" who has read his five books is invited to come and join the fun.

Harry Mack, assisted by Sally Ann Carey, is going to bring some of his wonderful marionettes to the party, and will make them act out a very famous scene from a famous play for the partygoers. Harry's marionettes are well worth seeing, for he makes them himself, does all the designing necessary, and has been doing it for five years. The little creatures fairly seem alive in his hands—maybe some of the smaller guests will think they are alive. It wouldn't be surprising.

The Book Circus, which has been in action all summer, was conceived with the idea that reading books could be as much fun as a circus for small patrons of the library, if it were approached in the right manner. So a big tent and a flock of circus people were put on the bulletin board in arresting colors. Children who joined the circus had the fun of seeing their names written on gay little silhouettes and stuck on the board. Some of them insisted on putting the pin through their own name attaching it to the board. One little boy got some paste and pasted his on, so it wouldn't ever fall off!

They had membership cards too, with funny clowns dancing on them, and a list of all the "acts in the circus" set down. Fairy tales were billed as "Believe It Or Not," stories about little children were "Midgets," and of course animal yarns were "The Menagerie." Every time they brought back a book which they had read, a hole was punched in the card—which is something else they liked to do for themselves.
