Gene Autrey is another star who has been having difficulties with his studio. In his case it was just a little matter of money.

Remember the fugs when John Charles Thomas refused to broadcast if he couldn't finish with "Good Night, Mother"? Well, that same kind of trouble bobbed up on the Fibber McGee and Molly program and the rules of the broadcasting company were broken.

Fibber was ending with "Good night, Molly," and was told he couldn't do it any more. But "Molly" is the name of a character in the show, explained the sponsor, so it might logically belong there. In real life, "Molly" is the wife of Jim Jordan, the man who plays "Fibber McGee," and is just recovering from a long illness.

NEWLY-NAMED GROUP CHANGES MEETING NIGHT

The group of young persons "in the twenties," which holds weekly informal gatherings at the Community House, made two important decisions at its last meeting. First of all, the organization will henceforth be known as the Triangle Club but only spokesmen hasten to explain, in order to identify itself. The adoption of a name will not change the informal atmosphere which pervades the meetings.

Its second decision is to revert to the original meeting time, of Sunday nights, at approximately 7:30. This will enable more of the group's original supporters to attend the meetings, and also meet the need for a pleasant and quiet manner of finishing off the week-end.

This Sunday's gathering will be another unplanned evening, but much popping of corn and discussion is indicated. Tom Wade of Detroit has been invited to attend the meeting. He is one speaker who truly merits the words: "I needs no introduction," although his remarks will be more of a conversation than a speech. His hobby is collecting people, and he will probably tell about some of his prize "specimens."

Last week's meeting was a hay-die, and when those who braved the cold weather returned to the House, they discovered a crowd of equine spectators for them. Being and emanation toast furnished diversion for the remainder of the evening.

A study in black and white is Joan Fontaine, actress. A fashionable shirtmaker jacket of novelty wool, tweed top and penitentiary skirt of black wool. Studied ascot tie to match, white gauntlets, a black bag and black soiled-felt hat complete the ensemble.
