It's downright discouraging! To bring children safely through whooping cough, measles, mumps and chicken pox, then have them break out with swing fever!

The disease itself is seldom fatal, but the symptoms may be quite alarming. Victims writhe, twitch, reel, roll their eyes and make queer grimaces. Often swing fever sufferers appear to be running abnormally high temperatures, and become almost violent. In their delirium they imagine themselves to be "cats," "alligators," "pitter-bugs," and other weird animals. Their rambles are unintelligible.

If only swing fever had a definite course to run! Having lived through the six weeks her children had whooping cough, a mother could survive six weeks of swing if she could be sure it would be over at the end of that time. But it seems to drag on indefinitely.

And there are so many things swing fever sufferers are allergic to. The radio is poison, and rid of it. Every time swing victims get near a radio, they begin going through convulsions. Just as has fever sufferers might be terrified by a field of goldenrod. Most children afflicted are terribly allergic to Benny Goodman. His music produces the most prolonged spasms of the disease, and there are no immunizing "shots" to counteract this susceptibility unless it would be to shoot Goodman.

As for treatment, the mother is cautioned to be calm and keep down her own temperature. It's alarming, but all children's diseases are, while they last. There may be times when the distracted mother fears her child on the verge of dementia. But if she recalls the time Jimmy had measles, when his temperature went up to 105, and he tried to crawl on all-fours because he thought he was a dog, she will realize that it's just another child's ailment when he comes down with swing fever and calls himself a "cat."

What of Johnny does squirm as if he had poison ivy, and what if Mary does make faces and roll back her eyes as if she swallowed a pin, it's all just part of swing fever. Try to keep the patient cool and as quiet as possible. In reversing the musical diet, it wouldn't be wise to withdraw all Goodman at once, but give it in increasingly smaller doses, unless the patient becomes too violent.

If there are several children, and the disease goes right through the family, those afflicted should be quarantined in the same room. When they become on their feet, another will find relief by crawling into the cedar chest and muffling her head in the blankets. Otherwise, there isn't much one can do.

The only consoling thought for parents whose children have swing fever is that it is a disease of childhood, and that if they have it hard enough now, like many other maladies of youth, they may be immune for life when they grow up!

Oh girls! Here's a man! Now I want you to listen carefully to this little lecture on "What Every Woman Knows," so we'll ask the subject to step up on this platform and revolve, like a good boy!

Just look at him—he's coughing and sneezing as though it were the middle of winter. His wife (that smart looking lady in the long hat) can wear a short coat and thin stockings and slippers all winter, and never have a sniffle. Frank, the other hand, encases himself in several layers of wool, overcoat, suit coat, vest, etc., and even THEN, he's always having colds. How does this happen?

Well, the masculine sex, much we hate to admit it, isn't awfully bright about some things. Men will sit in the damp ground and putter around in their gardens until it's dark to see. Then they come in and complain of a little twinge in the joints, and the next day they're like your poor fellow you see before you. Next case please—and take this subject home to bed—door him with aspirin and orange juice and put hot compresses at his feet.

Our second specimen is just as pitiful as the first one. See—he's purple with sunburn, even on his bald spot. And underneath that snowy white shirt is a back that resembles a boiled potato. Clearly a case of too much sun. His wife, that lady in the corner, holding the cold cream jar, is a nice golden brown, yet they both went the week-end at the country club. This poor man is but one of many sunburn cases, yet the ladies are cool as cucumbers. But why?

Now I only have one day a week in which to relax, the paragon male remarked, Sunday morning. "And I'm coming out to the club and PLAY." So he did. He played fifteen holes of golf in the morning, with never a hat to protect his pate from the glare. In the afternoon he went to the tennis courts for a while and then went in swimming. After that he was tired, he stretched out in his bathing suit and slept for about an hour. Any woman would have been glad to warm him. Now was so bent on having FUN that he was stubborn as a mule. Now look at him. You'd better take him away before he collapses. Load him into the wheel chair and get an ice pack for his head. You can rub him with cold cream when he cools off a little.

This quivering wreck on the platform now is a party-goer. He is pale green in color and his poor little eyes are rolled up in his nose. Inside his skull, his wife has been up for hours, boiling eggs for the kiddies' breakfasts, and soup. Catch him—his poor little tummy.

Well, what can you expect? Some friends of his dropped in last night and about midnight he asked his wife to make some coffee. Coffee was just the beginning though. He had kipped that herring and cheese sandwiches and brownies too, and he smoked that rank pipe all evening. Wife was smart. She had coffee and toast and D.D.T. together with a pipe.

That's all for today girls, and here's your money worth. 'The man is a peculiar creature. He's a great big boy of Wall street there's a defender of the wife and kiddies. His muscles are iron and he needs protection in himself. So if you women want to go on being championed by something two-fisted and strong, take a hint from the old song and "take care of the care-taker."
