Red Hearts and Pink Cupids

A WEEK from next Tuesday. Just another day? The same business schedule, or maybe you'll have to be over in Chicago for that conference—or if you're in town there will be the long drive back at the end of the day—dinner around seven, friends in for an evening of bridge or pleasant conversation. Just another day?

February 14th!

And February 14th used to be full of meaning for you—remember? It was that Valentine from Mary that you had hoped would show up in the mail, but you weren't quite sure that it was really on her list. It was before you were married, you had just met her and you weren't sure that she would say 'Yes', fact was, you hadn't known her long enough to even let her think that one day you would ask her to promise 'till death do us part'.

Then you were married.

Ah, that first year was real happiness. If you could only recapture that. Then remember when the first youngster arrived? How proud you were, and happy! Do you remember when Bill cut his first tooth? Here's a photograph of him around somewhere that you took that day. Haven't seen it now in a long time, have you. You've been too busy.

Then those long two weeks when Mary was so ill.

And when the doctor finally told you that the danger was past, that she would be well again, you quite unashamedly got down on your knees in thankfulness.

So much has happened since.

Now life seems so hurried and sometimes so complex that you're prone to forget about those little things which used to mean so much. You try to think of things which were important, sometimes you wonder what's missing today—you try to think back to those big little things which brought so much happiness.

On Valentine's Day, for instance; it isn't the red hearts and pink cupids or the love design that frames them, which used to mean so much. It's the assurance all over again that your devotion is changeless.

Recapture that heartbeat of years gone by.

Send her a Valentine this year. Let her know that she's your best pal—and that in spite of your busy schedule you had at the office that you still found time to think of her, and that even though it has been years since you sent one, that this year you remembered, and that there's still a touch of sentiment and youthful joy in your heart at the remembrance.

Red Hearts and Pink Cupids

Mark it down now—don't forget this year. See ours, select yours, send them to arrive on time.
