From the Women's Angle

By Marjorie Elaine Porter by marjore Liane Forter f those wide-eyed, curley-haired, breezy girls of mile and a song, and the boundless exuberance enties. Looking at her, the mature observer won-e of work might appeal to a girl so gay, carefree, oblivious of the more serious burdens life imand apparently oblisions of the more serious burdens life imposes.

What sort of work is she planning to do? Without hesitation, and with the poise of conviction also the serious control of the serious control of the serious control of the serious control of the serious control college to prepare herself for teaching in secondary schools. She hopes to be an insecondary schools. She hopes to see an expension of the fact of the fact in the secondary schools. She hopes to be an insecondary schools with the secondary schools. She hopes to be an insecondary school of the fact that school as unshaken faith in the wisdom of her choice.

There is an example which should inspire hope! In spite of all the disturbing publicity of the fact that school systems are handicaped in the present and have a feeling of insecurity toward the future in regard to
