Michigan Mirror

(Continued from Preceding Page) ago in Grand Rapids of Dutch and English blood. His father was a harness maker in Grand Rapids, and the family was poor.

From just across the border, editor in an American small city, Vandenberg rose rapidly in favor in the Senate during the past term as a leader of statesmen, and today he is a valued member of two of its leading committees—Foreign relations and Finance.

Working hard at the job, he has a solemn rule never to leave Washington while Congress is in session. Even during the delegate primary campaigns in western states this spring, he consistently declined to leave the capital for political speech-making trips.

The Philadelphia Record on June 21, 1937, drew this picture of the Michigan senator: "Tall, sparse-haired, Vandenberg swapped tortoise shell glasses for rimmed ones to 'look less bookish.' Likes to match pennies, bowl, play bridge, billiards. He carries a dictionary in his pocket, and he leaves the capital for political speech-making trips."

A lone wolf in Michigan politics, he is not a part of any faction and is inclined to leave state politics to the governor, Vandenberg's chief asset is his oratorical ability.

Those who heard his oration on the 'Spirit of Mackinac' at the governor's conference at Mackinac Island when Fred Green was lost to other state executives will profess wildy at the memory. Vandenberg can speak!

One of Vandenberg's qualities in abundance for others. This trait, combined with courage, has made him an outstanding figure in Washington.

No one will accuse him of compromising issues with President Roosevelt, yet when the president spoke at Indianapolis in the 1936 presidential campaign, the latter said that he and Vandenberg were such good friends that if the Republicans had nominated the Grand Rapids senator the two candidates could have stamped the country from the same platform!

This prestige of oratory has helped Vandenberg in the past to remain in the voters' good graces. There has been controversy that Vandenberg at Washington is an asset to Michigan. "He does not state credit."

Expert at Compromise... Called a genius at the art of offering workable compromises, Vandenberg is also respected for his unyielding opposition to anything that he deems inimical to national interests. He led the fight on the Panama canal. He blocked the Florida ship canal. He assailed the multi-billion reserve fund created by the Social Security Act. He was the author of the amendment to the 1933 Banking Act which created insurance for bank deposits.

In foreign affairs he has been an isolationist, much hated by the America entered the World war only because Wall Street wanted to.
