IN DECEMBER

The snow lies soft and still and white and deep On all the walks and fences, on the grass And roofs and trees. Along the road are steep Huge frosted drifts. There is no place to pass Unless one makes great hollows with his feet. Like cutting jagged places in a sheet Or mammoth coverlet. Keen blows the wind And stings my cheeks and yet I do not mind. All the familiar landmarks that I knew Have vanished, and beneath the vast dense blue Of heaven, diamonded in crystal, is a very lovely world, a fairland! —BEATRICE McDONALD
