From the Women's Angle

By NELLIE HURLEY MINIFIE

Last week 20,000 Detroiters hurried in out of the cold and snow, off of the busy streets where newsmen bellowed of revolution, mass suicides and civilian destruction in Europe, they crowded into every seat and filled standing room to capacity at the Masonic Temple, to get just a glimpse of one last remaining shred of Imperial Russia.

Although the Ballet Russe as we see it today has but a handful of Russians in its troupe, its beginnings were firmly imbedded in Russian Russia. The history of the Russian ballet is a history of its Czars and aristocracy. It is the history of a regime that has disappeared from this world.

But the ballet that began during the reign of Peter the Great today finds itself far from its homeland. The journey began in the early 1900's when distant Dancieff first took off from Russia that first little aggregation of dancers, to electric Paris and astonish continental Europe with an art that Western civilization had long thought a state of decline.

For the first time in their lives dancers emerged from anonymity to find themselves the toast of Berlin, London and Paris. It was in this period that the now almost legendary figures in ballet lived and danced: Nijinsky, Karsavina, Pavlova, Fokine.

The United States had but one brief glimpse of that original company that made a short tour during the latter stages of World War I. But six years ago the ballet came back to us once again, a new company, new faces replacing those stars who have faded into history.

The 20,000 Detroiters who came out last week to see these marvelous dancers spin, whirl, jump are ample proof that this second World War cannot paralyze the Ballet Russe as did World War I in 1914-1918. Since that first star, ballet companies have widened their artistic scope, have brought to the heads of a now vanished empire.

Mrs. Cornelia Smith celebrated her 92nd and is well and happy. There are only three persons that were here when George H. Tom struck town. These are Palmer H. Sherman, Mrs. Smith and Dr. C. M. Bayliss. The doctor was just the same. George pleads guilty to the young age of 74. Palmer is 20. You can guess on the M.D.'s.
