Baldwin Library Has Several Books On Important Question of S. America

Uncle Sam coking an anxious eye these days at the vast unexplored continent sprawling to the south of us results in a spate of new books about the land of coffee and revolutions. Much has been written about South America in the adventurous gold-diamond-and-orchid vein. Just notes with European powers looking enviously westward to its immense resources, Americans are increasingly interested in more concrete information about our southern neighbors.

The letter began bravely, never ebbing down into the mire of sentimentality. Nor was the writer an educated woman, yet in a sympathy of all who heard her brief and impassioned plea. Her son, that English mother wrote hopefully and trustingly, was not that other children. He was easily won and easily managed. His gesture, his complex little mind needed love and gentle guidance just as his sturdy young body needed nourishment.

From the Women's Angle

By NELLIE HURLEY MINIFFE He was kind, gentle and affectionate as a well-bred puppy. But he needed guidance and counseling. The one to whom he was entrusted would, his mother felt, find him pliable and easily manageable. She wrote, the letter continued, that his foster parents in a far away land might deal with his problems and peculiarities as he had.

When the cheese is to be melted in a sauce it may be grated, flaked, or shaved. But when it is mixed in a batter or dough—as in a hot muffin, bread, or biscuit—it must be grated first. These fine particles can then be mixed thoroughly with the other ingredients. The cheese will not cling together nor form into hard lumps.

State College Seeks To Find Secret of Birdseye Maple What makes the eye in birdseye maple has become the object of a study at Michigan State University. The gift was accepted recently by the State Board of Agriculture, governing body at the college. From a donor who prefers to remain anonymous and whose only interest is curiosity, according to a bulletin from the college forestry department. No one seems to know now why a hard maple tree, the annual growth that turns out birdseye grain in the wood, Woodmen do not know what the annual growth in feet in diameter can be worth around $200 and that such logs usually are cut into other maple or two in an acre of virgin sugar maple forest.

Alma Marra, graduate student from Syracuse University in New York, has been appointed by Professor Herbert to help conduct the study. Marra is to aid in the two-fold attack on the problem. First, she will study the somewhat technical, one-inch anatomical study. Marra is obtaining living tissue from certain trees in the college owned woods at Dunbar near Sault Ste. Marie. These are to be studied under the microscope. The other phase involves an attempt to graft twigs from birdseye maple trees on other maple stock at East Lansing. Staff members in the horticulture department are assisting in these grafting operations.
