

PART TWO

When in Danger, Use Head First

LANSING—If you are lost or in danger of drowning, it's better to use your head than your feet.

Conservation officers, who each year lead lost persons back to their woods camps, and have rescued quite a number from over-turned boats and other water hazards in past seasons are urging vacationers to prepare themselves for emergencies with a few commonsense rules.

If lost in the woods, it is better to stop and try to figure out where you are, instead of wandering about. In a storm or fog, or at night, it is best to make camp, after gathering fuel for a fire, and wait for better traveling conditions.

Shoes and heavy outer clothing should be shed to make swimming easier, when that is advisable. Due regard for balancing the boat will dictate care in standing up, changing seats, and rescuing persons from the water—which is best done over the stern, rather than over the side.

A knowledge of artificial respiration, which is part of the training of all conservation officers, may be invaluable for vacationers in remote regions.

In Error The visitor paid his bill at the fashionable hotel, and as he went out, he noticed a sign near the door. "Have you left anything,"
