From the Women's Angle

No house ever built big enough to hold two families or parts of two families, but this is a fact which young people planning to marry should bear in mind.

If the budget is limited, prospective brides and bridegrooms, straining at the leash, are apt to marry and move in with the parents in order to save money rather than wait until they can support an independent home, or, if a dependent parent, to attempt that possible arrangement of having that parent live with them, or, if a dependent parent, to attempt that possible arrangement of having that parent live with them, or, if a dependent parent, to attempt that possible arrangement of having that parent live with them.

Particularly unfortunate is the situation which exists in the home of a young man and woman, who are living with the parents, and who are planning to marry and move in with the parents, and who are planning to marry and move in with the parents.

Small injuries, some large pretensions and disagreements, become quarrels as the two families, coupled up together all day, with the varying viewpoints of their separate generations, wear their edges of tolerance, and the young man and woman, who are planning to marry and move in with the parents, and who are planning to marry and move in with the parents.

Many a marriage has been perched on the rocks of a three-cornered household. So, in order to preserve the bliss of matrimony, the bride and groom should consider the possibility of a separate home. The parent's question will be harder as well as the couple, if he, or she, can maintain at least a financial independence.

A successful marriage is hard enough to achieve under the best of circumstances, without entering into two strikes against
