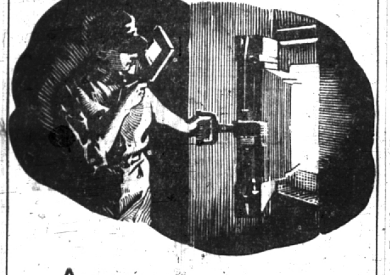
We wanted "inside facts" about

A RAGING INFERNO



ANOTHER RESEARCH JOB THAT HELPED BRING YOU ELECTRICITY AT LOWER COST

How would you go about studying a fiery furnace from the inside? Detroit Edison engineers wanted to know more about what goes on inside a boiler furnace, where temperatures range up to 3,000 degrees Fahrenheit. Because these large boilers in our power plants burn many tons of coal a day to make electricity, any improvement in their operating efficiency meant a saving of thousands of dollars. What kind of coal burned best? What was the best draft arrangement for good combustion? What was the correct proportion of coal, air, water?

To answer these questions, two famous tests that pioneered in this field were undertaken . . . the Dr. Jacobus test in 1911, at our Delray Plant, and a test 10 years later on No. 14 boiler at our Conners Creek Plant. In the latter test, fifty-four men in three 8-hour shifts worked steadily for more than four months. They swarmed over the boiler like gnomes—climbing up its sides, peering into its vitals, weighing coal and water, measuring air, conducting analyses of gases with complicated instruments, taking the temperature of the fire. When they were through, they had learned facts that meant a saving of millions of dollars in present and future boiler design. It is this kind of research that enables us to bring you an ever-improved service at lower and lower rates. The average price per kilowatthour paid by our residence customers today is 46 per cent less than in 1921. The Detroit Edison Company.
