scribes to get you the facts of your various community. He'll merely take from the public record the information there, and record it as our publications.

We Don't "Create" News
We didn't create the news; we had little to do with the courts who dispose of this case. It is in keeping with our own personal motives, we either "play it up" sensationally, or "play it down" so that it is almost lost.

The Eccentric subscribes to the plan of "playing it down" we don't want to make certain of the daily press to obtain readers—and we wouldn't, even if it seemed financially profitable.

Yet, in one specific case referred to in these paragraphs, considerable "press" was created, using both John H. Harwood, managing editor, and myself, to keep this item from our columns. It was quite interesting to learn of the individual reactions of those who contacted us on this issue. Naturally, the garbage were among them, and one can sympathetically understand their attitude. So let's set aside the parents, and consider a few of the others.

Nearly every one who talked to us didn't have all the facts; they had been asked to contact us and, being human, did so. I can understand this, too. Even though I can't agree with many of their arguments...

One chap said to me, "I don't think that you ought to print any news of that nature; we live in a neighborhood community, and what good can be served by publishing news about our citizens, especially young people?"

I asked him, "I've known you for more than 20 years; you've been taking The Eccentric that length of time, and during this period we have printed scores of pieces of news about local, as well as outside, people; yet you've never raised your voice against our policy—and you only do so now because the case we are discussing involves one of your own?"

He had no answer, and I understand that, too. No decent newspaperman wants to print news that reflect upon the life and character of others; all he can be, as an honest reporter, is to mirror his community. That's the only justification for a newspaper's existence, anyway.

When a young man, or woman, (or an older one), gets into a tangle with the law, he not only brings suffering to himself, but to his family, as well; yet it is a matter that the innocent suffer with the guilty as an inexcusable by-product of wrong-doing.

Fear of Publicity
Of the greatest and most effective devices society has, as an aid to good behavior, is the threat of publicity. Since we believe that fear influences individuals, and helps to keep them on the right path, it also influences boys, and thus makes them more careful of their children's environment.

The Eccentric, I repeat, and again repeat, dislikes to print bad news. It's the worst of all. All other newspapers have a responsibility and a duty to the whole people. Since we believe that police news should be published, with decent regard for decency, we're out for the public.

That's what we at The Eccentric are trying to do. We don't claim perfection in so doing, either; but we do assert that we are not a "yellow" newspaper. We're a human right and liberty newspaper, and that's what we do. That's what we propose to do here in Birmingham.

While all of the physical meanness of The Eccentric rests with its owners, the real value of The Eccentric lies in the amount and quality of your FAITH in its willingness to forthrightness, to decency, to constructive journalism, to honest reporting, when honestly treated, will always deserve and win public support and approval.

Meatless Menus Can Be Healthful

Prospects of meat rationing and meatless menus need not disturb the resourceful homemaker. By planning carefully, she can make sure her family gets the right food for fitness and size can serve some tasty meals, too.

Some information on the food values meat contains and how to get this food in other foods is recommended by home economics extension specialists at Michigan State College.

Meat is an excellent source of protein. In addition, it has three members of the vitamin B group, namely, thiamine and riboflavin, and also contains iron. But these food values can be obtained from other sources.

Vegetables, such as dried peas and beans, and particularly soybeans, have protein too. But it takes more of the vegetable group and in good variety, to equal one pound of meat.

Ashy from meats, namon is received from grain products, with wholewheat bread or cereal grains. Still other sources of protein are nuts, peanuts, and grains, especially whole grains.

Thiamine in the day's meals, even in a meatless menu, is obtained by eating plenty of whole grain foods, potatoes, the dry legumes, eggs, leafy green vegetables, and many fruits. Good sources of riboflavin are milk, bread, eggs, and grain products, particularly whole-grain cereals.

Iron is received from many sources, green vegetables, and fruits. Good sources of iron are whole wheat flour, dried legumes, eggs, potatoes, leafy vegetables, and fruits.

USO Asks Used Football Equipment

Numerous requests from former athletes now serving in the armed forces in this area for usable football equipment have been made to Metropolitan Detroit District USO.

Officers of USO have issued a collection request on to the public, to schools, colleges, groups and individuals who have used adult football equipment, such as jerseys, pants, shoulder and hip pads, helmets, shoes, etc.

The USO will act as clearing house for all equipment donated, and make sure that it is in satisfactory sanitary condition before being passed on to the posts in this area.

Wrecked Planes Going for Salvage

SPRIDGE FIELD—Every "bird" from egg crates to paint brushes is being saved at Spridge Field under orders that this post is to act as a collection center for the national salvage program.

William T. Colman, Spridge Field commanding officer, has listed some new items which are of salvage importance. These are in addition to all the articles that normally are conserved at military establishments and to all the articles which have been saved more recently since the nation has come to know about shortages and rationing.

Colman also has designated a salvage officer who is assigned to the task of stripping the field of anything not in use and of strategically important material.

Salvage emphasizes conservation of used materials. It also includes renovation for maximum utility—when the item has apparently served its purpose, it is discarded into a dump to be made over again.

Although the adjustment of top burners on gas stoves can be easily made by inexperienced persons, following instructions on the card, customers are advised to call on the gas heaters and special appliances are requested not to use these appliances unless sure of the adjustment, until the service man has completed the change-over at your home.

We are prepared to complete the task of changing over the service to the many thousands of customers with all speed possible and with continuous service. State Police Have New Radio Setup

EAST LANSING—Completion of the installation of a two-way radio system that gives the Michigan State Police the most complete police radio communication system in the world was announced today by Commissioner Oscar C. Olander.

Every post and every patrol car today is equipped with frequency modulation, transmitting and receiving units that permit instantaneous communication combinations.

While known as a two-way system, in reality the provides four-way communication—from way station to car, from car to station, from station to station and from car to car.

Captain C. J. Scavarda, officer in charge of communications for the state police, said completion of the installation increased service to the public by 30 per cent without any increased personnel. His estimate was based on time normally lost in the past in finding out phones and establishing connections with stations by officers having only a one-way radio connection.

State Police Michigan's 5600th square miles, the province of state police patrol car on the post remote road now can receive an emergency call and with the flick of a switch on the panel board of his car, talk as easily with his commanding officer at the post 40 miles away as if they were together in the car.
