CHANGES COMING

The Government's cutback program for war industries will profoundly affect the aircraft picture for the balance of the year.

This shift from emphasis on plant construction to production, started by the WPB, permits the Army Air Forces to evaluate its models on the basis of combat performances. As a result some types of aircraft will not be built in the new program, while others will be radically changed and improved. Where certain types are discontinued, the plants will be used to make others.

Pipe Down!

Plea Is Presented For Small Business At Bankers' Parley

Representatives of member Banks of the Michigan Bankers Association met on June 24 in the Grand Hotel at Mackinac Island for a war-time conference.

Advance notice of the elimination of entertainment confined attendance to those who were attracted by a program devoted to topics of practical interest to bankers in these times. Matters of special interest to banks were presented for discussion by experienced and authoritative leaders; also problems shared by bankers with executives in virtually all other fields of business endeavor. Herbert H. Gardner, president of the Birmingham National Bank, attended, together with Mrs. Gardner.

Marshall Diggs Speaks

The much-discussed problems of so-called "small business" in a war economy was handled in able fashion by Marshall R. Diggs, consultant, Smaller War Plants Corporation. "Today, due to the war, there is an abnormal concentration of work in the larger plants, and a very sub-normal volume in many smaller plants. So long as the speed of victory is not adversely affected, a more even spread of this work load is, in every other sense, most desirable.

"We are charged with mobilizing every force of business and Government, which can aid in effecting the fullest possible use of the smaller plants of America —first and primarily in the interests of winning the war, and secondly in the production of essential civilian goods. Some very substantial results are being accomplished.

"When you keep in mind that normally only 4 percent of the 184,000 plants in the United States employ over 250 people and about 80 percent normally employ less than 50 people, you will sense the major role of smaller plants in our regular economy.

"Fortunately, not all of these plants are in distress, but many thousands are. They need help. They deserve help, and each community's local stake in their welfare will prompt its leaders to take such helpful action as falls within their respective spheres of influence. Much, indeed, can and must be done on each local front by local people."

Discuss War Bonds

The subject of war bond sales found a place on the program because of the interest of banks as extensive investors in securities of the United States Government and their activities as agents in the promotion and sale of war bonds to the public. Likewise, "ration banking," another war-time service undertaken by banks, came in for full exploration and discussion. In this direction as well as in the sale of war bonds, the facilities of banks have been made available as a co-operative aid in the handling of the great amount of detail involved.

As all are aware, the preoccupation of people with the concerns of war has not precluded thoughtful consideration of the problems and opportunities that will confront us in a post-war economy. John K. Langum, assistant vice-president, Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago, dealt both statistically and analytically with the subject: "The Post-war Implications of War Finance." Mr. Langum presented facts bearing on present and prospective expansion of the Federal debt and its possible concomitants.

Must Control Inflation

He stressed the necessity for wisely conceived and properly applied controls if the disorders of drastic inflation are to be avoided and the prospects for constructive post-war activity conserved. He left no doubt that in his opinion broad opportunities in both domestic production and world trade confront the nation, their realization being subject to certain well-defined conditions. Notable among these he cited the leadership of an intelligent and courageous private enterprise to supplement the efforts of government with its knowledge of the technique of production and marketing. "For a period of indeterminate length during which we shall be preoccupied with the task of contributing to the rebuilding and development of a world at peace. The oportunity awaits us, limited only by the intelligence, effort, and orderliness we are willing to bring to the task," he said.

"This well attended war-time conference of bankers was notable, not perhaps for display of free and easy optimism, but for its recognition of problems present and future and the confidence that they can be dealt with constructively if all hands turn in and pitch," Mr. Gardner declared.
