Then came the order to move on, and for three days and nights the regiment tolled toward the front. The men dismounted from their vehicles one night—and the next morning they were, in the line. Quentin Brelsford Is Now Near Naples, with American Air Force

Harry E. Brelsford writes changing the address of The Eccentric which is being sent to his son, Capt. Quentin M. Brelsford, in a repair squadron of an air depot near Naples, in Italy, and says: "Quentin often remarks about how much he enjoys the Eccentric and says he reads every word including the ads, not once but several times. He gets all the issues but sometimes three or four arrive at once due to delays in transit.

"One package that we sent him to Sicily had one article wrapped in an Eccentric. Shortly after he received this package he sent us some presents and used the same Eccentric to wrap one of them so we now have in our collection some of your issues that went to war and came back all in good shape.

"Quentin is well, he is still a corporal, now speaks Italian and of course Spanish, both fluently. He thinks Birmingham is twice as valuable as all of Europe and if he never sees any more of Europe it will still be too much."
