

THIS AND THAT

(Continued from Page 1) So, to that reader's query about the final settlement of less-landed debts no one can now give the accurate and final answer.

Perhaps, though, the cost of this war, in life and property, may inspire more people to pay attention to the causes of war; if it does, and long delays another one, it will also have been worth the sacrifices, horribly tremendous though they will be.

In such a case, each of us would rush to the fire with every fire-fighting device we possessed; if, against it was lost or burned up, we certainly wouldn't charge it against the neighbor whose house was on fire, thus threatening our own, would we? Under such circumstances there is a community of common danger, and the instinctive law of help-one-another would prevail.

In a very similar sense, the European war was to the United States, like the neighbor's house on fire; this conclusion, folks, isn't an academic one as you will know.

STARLING

(Continued from Page 1) In the woods, the fields and slushings completed the daylight hours but insist on getting back into town tonight. So if they are driven from one section of town to another, they find some other location, or, if they are driven entirely out of one town, they move on to some other city.

And as for petties Mr. Spinning says they could be used, but during the daylight hours but insist on getting back into town tonight. So if they are driven from one section of town to another, they find some other location, or, if they are driven entirely out of one town, they move on to some other city.

Mr. Spinning also suggested that the trees around his part of the city be thinned out, thus making that area less attractive to the birds. "There would still be plenty of trees for our humans," he said. But after careful and exhaustive study of the problem the only thing finally agreed upon was that the starlings apparently had been on the city to the pitch and west so well entrenched they would be most difficult to remove this late in the season, but that next year complete plans should be set up early and the first returning starling should be met with a barrage of fire shot on a heavy stream of water. "We'll shoot 'em as soon as we see the dark of their feathers," declared Commissioner Estes.
