Here Are Some Worthwhile Hints To Victory Gardeners of Birmingham

Cutworms, one of the most destructive of all garden pests, can be effectively combated with a bait of poisoned dandelions, according to C. S. Rose, Victory garden chairman. A day or two before you set out tomato, cabbage, pepper or other young garden plants, pick about two pounds of chopped dandelion greens with one ounce of Paris Green. Make the bait in the morning and let it wilt until evening, when some worms come out of the ground to feed. Then distribute it through the sections of your garden where you plan to set out plants. After the plants are in the ground they can be protected with collars made of cardboard or several thicknesses of newspaper set one inch in the ground and extending one inch above it. Cutworms are found most frequently in newly plowed sod soil.

If you find hundreds of tiny holes in the leaves of your tomatoes, egg plant, corn, beets, cabbage and other plants, it is a sign that the flea beetles have arrived. Flea beetles are among the first insects to make their appearance in the garden. They are small, black, metallic, and about the size of the blackhead pin. The fact that they jump when disturbed accounts for their name.

Damage from flea beetles can be prevented if plants are dusted regularly. Cryolite dust, which can be purchased under several trade names, is perhaps the best material to use for these pests. If cryolite not available, Bordeaux mixture or fixed copper fungicides plus calcium arsenate will do the trick. Although less effective, the use of Rotenone or a dust made of one pound of calcium arsenate and nineteen pounds of gypsum will do a fairly satisfactory job.

Although birds, during most of the year, are among the gardener's best friends, there are certain times, particularly in the first week to ten-day period after the garden has been planted, that they are likely to be troublesome. It is then that such birds as crows and pheasants feed lustily on newly sown seed. They may also attack corn when it is in the milk or dough stage.

Birds can be frightened away from a garden, for short periods at least, by setting out sticks 6 to 8 feet high with a heavy cord strung between them. Fasten strips of white cloth or paper on the string at intervals. When the birds get used to the white strips change the color of the paper or cloth or replace the strips with pieces of mirror or metal that will reflect light and make a certain amount of noise. A scarecrow will also frighten off birds for a few days, but they soon get wise to all these tricks. To keep them out of your garden you'll have to keep changing your frightening devices.

Early Day Life In Birmingham Is Interestingly Recalled By R. D. Bird

Things were not always as they are today in Birmingham, as most of the city's more recent residents can well imagine. However, it is hard to imagine things as they were 60 years ago in the years when Birmingham was practically a frontier settlement on the old Saginaw Trail and, in Detroit, south of here, the fastest form of public transportation featured the horse as a motor.

R. D. Bird, a lifelong Birmingham resident from the days it was called Piety Hill, who now resides at 627 Purdy Street, skipped lightly over the day of the land in the good old days and, while he was skipping, this reporter jotted down a few of the related incidents and items.

Mr. Bird was the son of the Rev. R. D. Bird, Sr., who served as the pastor of the local Methodist congregation at the time the present church was built in 1871. The corner stone was laid by Mrs. Bird, Jr., was born the following year. His father served the Methodist flock here, and in Warren, and Detroit, and built the church with horse and rig to preach Sunday evenings. He returned on Monday morning and pitched in with the farmers of the cohgregation and cut and finished timber for the new church.

The population of the town then was probably between 300 and 500 but there were many farms in the very near vicinity—along Brown street, for instance. Brown was the farthermost street to the south and the farms came right up to it. On the west, Southfield was also a boundary and there were farms between it and the Rouge river. Willetts street marked the extent of development on the north side and, while Greenwood extended over on Oak street, was there at that time, the only thing between it and Willetts was woods. Between Willetts and Main, on the north side of Southfield, was a dandy stand of timber and a man by the name of Randall fed, and partially planted a herd of deer that hung around the place which people preferred to as "the deer park." The old Grand Trunk line ran through town where Hunter boulevard is now and many of the newer set residents remember; only then it was the eastern boundary and farms extended beyond it.

Down behind the Bell greenhouses at that time, was a highly prolific field of buckwheat and Bird says he cradled grain all up and down the middle of Ann street and Landon and Floyd, too. Of course, there were no streets then. Woodward avenue was there, but it was called the Saginaw Trail and beside it grew the buckwheat.

He also remembers going to Detroit with a team of horses for supplies and building materials. He was only a lad of 12 or 13 when he first made the trip alone with a big team of horses and heavy farm wagon. The trail was barely wide enough for such an outfit to pass through. Timber and brush came right up to the narrow roadbed. The trail led through the Royal Oak swamp, now the Royal Oak cemetery, and through cleared farm areas until it came to Grand boulevard, which was the northern outskirts of the big city. The trip for building supplies took him way down to Fort street and in order to get back the same day he started, he pulled out of Birmingham at one o'clock in the morning. Many times farmers, returning through the Royal Oak swamp from Detroit, were hijacked by bandits and their money taken from them. Young Bird used to hustle his team to get back through that district before dark. The bandits never bothered a farmer going to Detroit because they were not liable to have anything of value with them, except farm products. It was when they returned with their wagons empty and their pockets full that they were in danger. Even if they returned with a wagon-load of something-or-other they were comparatively safe from the bandits, because they figured their money had been spent for the contents of the load. Later on the swamp was cleared and the farmers who first inhabited it could go out before breakfast and kill a half dozen rabbits and partridges for the variety. The bandits left of their own accord.

Modern inhabitants of Birmingham often remark the oddity that Birmingham is the only community in these parts that doesn't have a beer garden, or a public bar. Such was not always the case according to Mr. Bird, for, on the spot where the stately Birmingham National Bank now stands, stood a saloon of the wettest variety. Through its swinging doors passed the roughest and toughest clientele that ever graced the streets of Birmingham on Saturday nights. Yes, within its walls congregated the fightingest bunch of roughnecks that ever blacked an eye or flattened a nose. With their passing, and from that frontier setting, came the modern Birmingham that people know today. It is doubtful that many of the modern sons and daughters could be coaxed into going back into the realm of the he-men, and staunch women, of that day, but as one man said, "we'll bet our next week's pay" that Mr Bird and some of the old guard that remain among the citizenry, would like to return for a last stroll around the old days, and for just one more look at things as they were when "men were men and the women could bake bread" in Birmingham.

Blood Donors of City and County Give Many Pints

The hundreds of Birmingham residents who either aided in the recent blood donor campaign or actually gave blood during the various campaigns will be interested to know that the total amount of blood collected in Oakland county up to April 24 was 27,837 pints, according to Harry Hoey, chairman of the blood donor service of the Oakland County Chapter, American Red Cross. Mr. Hoey reports that the collection of blood has been continuous for a eighteen year old has been all that was necessary to accept a donor. A printed release is now necessary. This ruling includes married people. In the instance husband or wife may sign the release. Parents of the individual may also sign the release. The only exception to this rule is in the case of a minor who is in uniform of one of the military services of the United States.

All blood after collection by the Red Cross is turned over immediately to processing laboratories and from them it becomes the property of the United States Army and Navy, to be used at their discretion.

The Army and Navy have entered into contracts with a number of large commercial laboratories for definite amounts of fresh plasma or serum albumin. Fulfillment of these contracts is dependent upon the ability of Red Cross Blood Donor service to supply forms in various centers an adequate amount of blood a week. To meet the responsibility each center has been assigned weekly quotas, based on the population of the city and surrounding region. The Mobile Unit visits towns and communities of Oakland county at frequent intervals for the purpose of filling its quota.
