The telegram from the war department came to his wife, Mrs. Joan Russell in Detroit.

Navy Man Missing Sunday afternoon word came to Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Ryder, 912 Floyd street, that their son, Raymond Keith Ryder, 19, petty officer, second class, USNR, was missing in action.

The young petty officer was a Bloomfield Hills High School graduate and had been in the navy the past two years. He had already served in several theaters of land fighting and is believed to have been aboard a ship doing convoy duty.

His last letter came Monday. It was dated May 28 and stated he was OK but did not give his location. He had attended Sunday morning church services and in the letter he said he was feeling fine.

Surviving besides the parents are a brother, Gary, E. Ryder, Camp Blanding, Florida, and his grand parents, Mr. and Mrs. R. D. Bird, Purdy street.

PLANNING

He urged that Birmingham start at once on its general campaign to secure a complete city planning for a city of 60,000 persons. He explained that on the basis of studies just completed this city might expect to grow to 60,000 population in the next 50 years.

EVERYBODY

If the mills cannot get waste paper they can't make the containers.

If they can't make the containers, the shell can, heavy, medical supply and other manufacturers cannot ship their products to the Army and Navy shipping depots.

If these goods cannot be shipped in great volume, regularly, to reach the battlefronts on time, the whole war effort goes down—and fighting men and nursing women, the prime youth of America, die like flies.

No—save waste paper. Save every scrap of it. Recyclers are 600,000 tons a month have been enough to keep the war effort going.
