IN THIS DAY OF Important Letters

WHEN your letter counts so highly to its recipient; surely it deserves to be backgrounded by stationery which carries with it your own, individual personality—don't you think? Such an added note of graciousness is, after all, only a matter of careful, thoughtful selection—like the master printing craftsman who, when planning a book or brochure, selects the paper as carefully as the type face. . . . Time was when we were urged to phone or telegraph instead of write. With the advent of war, though, correspondence immediately came back into its own! And in this day of important letters to separated relatives and friends, who are sometimes more interested in letters than anything else, one should not neglect sending letters which carry with them the very personality of the writer—including, of course, for it can best be done that way—individualized stationery.
